Dr. J. Keith Motley (inset), who has presided over the unprecedented growth of the UMass Boston campus in Dorchester since 2007, announced his decision to resign from the post last week. His exit comes amid a swirling debate about the campus' finances, which have been strained by new building projects and infrastructure challenges on the campus. UMass community decries impact of budget cuts

By JENNIFER SMITH

Even as they applauded the legacy of UMass Boston chancellor Keith Motley, who announced his resignation last week, several elected officials have continued to express concern about the tenor of conversation that led up to his departure, in particular talk about the university's financial situation.

Motley has headed up the university – the city's only public research educational institution – since 2007, and plans to step down on June 30, take a year's sabbatical, then return to campus as a tenured professor.

Still dealing with the political fallout from last week's announcement, the broader UMass community this week objected strongly to the manner in which school officials have handled the financial hurdles that have been highlighted by Motley's resignation.

UMass Boston reported an expected $15 million end-of-year deficit in late January, and UMass officials said Tuesday that number is now down to between $6 and $7 million.

At this week's UMass board of trustees meeting, students, faculty, and community members held up signs protesting budget cuts intended to reduce the UMass Boston deficit. A majority of the 60 courses that have been cut to help compensate for the deficit without input from instructors have been restored, officials said at the meeting.

UMass Boston Chancellor Keith Motley on Tuesday offered his support for Barry Mills, the man who will replace him when he steps down from his post this summer. Motley, who announced his intention to resign last week, told University of Massachusetts trustees that he was leaving “with dignity” and without regrets after leading the campus for 10 years.

“I own every issue,” he told the board's Committee of the Whole during a meeting held to discuss his campus's finances. “I get too much credit for the successes and I'm proud to wear on my back whatever is on my back around this

The goal: help Dot families build wealth

Ullian Institute aims to create path out of systemic poverty

By CLARA HUDSON
SPECIAL TO THE REPORTER

The Boys and Girls Clubs of Dorchester will launch an initiative this year that is aimed at lifting families out of systemic poverty with an innovative approach using emerging research on neuro science. Fueled by a $500,000 donation by philanthropist Dora Ullian, the Lifting Individuals and Families Together (LIFT) pilot program will seek to assist eligible parents with skills and coaching to ready them for careers in high-paying jobs that are now out of reach to many Dorchester families.

LIFT is based on a “mobility mentoring” program developed by Economic Mobility Pathways (EMPath), which teaches families to set and achieve goals for themselves to become more stable.

The results of the half-million dollar commitment will take shape over three years in the newly formed Ullian Institute, based at the Dorchester Avenue offices of the Boys and Girls Clubs of Dorchester. Participants will be drawn from the club's own pool of families, which today includes 4,000 children from ages 2 months to 18 years, according to Mary Kinsella, the club's vice-president of early childhood education.

“It's not mandatory –

they have to be willing,” said Kinsella. “People will be ready at different levels, and we'll be able to meet them where they are. There is no one-size-fits-all.”

‘Participation’ ... ‘energy’ mark Democratic events as newcomers join the fray

By JENNIFER SMITH

Participation in Massachusetts Democratic Party affairs has amped up since November, party officials say, bringing uncharacteristically high numbers to ward meetings and spurring an influx of new delegates.

With groups including immigrants, Muslims, LGBTQ individuals, women and people of color expressing increasing nervousness about the Trump administration's priorities, Democratic observers say they have seen a corresponding bump in local political involvement.

“As a state rep, I've noticed a large uptick in people reaching out on federal issues and wondering how they can work on state issues,” said Dorchester legislator Dan Hunt. “That's encouraging to see, because we want to connect with people, and I've noticed a large amount of people engaging in the process that never have before.”

Hunt said a recent meeting of Ward 16 included at least 15 to (Continued on page 12)

David Arrowsmith and Martin Davis are transforming the old Sonny’s in Adams Village into Industry, a lounge and eatery set to open this summer.

Taking a peek inside Industry,
Adams Village’s next pub-eatery

BY BILL FORRY

It’s called Industry, a 140-seat lounge and restaurant serving up American comfort food and a large variety of wines and whiskeys, and it’s is on track for a summertime completion in Adams Corner. The eatery will replace Sonny’s, the longtime neighborhood hangout that was sold last year to David Arrowsmith and Martin Davis.

This is the first restaurant-bar project for the duo. Arrowsmith, who owns Neponset-based Capital Construction, is leading a team of builders who are installing new windows, doors and building out the interior of the space, including a state-of-the-art, 618-square foot kitchen.

The partners led the Reporter on a tour of the space on Monday. A 30-seat main bar will feature 16 tap beers—including nitrogen-fueled Guinness— and a massive, mahogany wine cabinet. The large room will be lined with red-leather booths and floor-to-ceiling windows that will open up to Adams Street.

As they promised, the partners are leaving no trace of the Sonny’s footprint. His bar’s wooden front doors are in the basement, where there’ll be re-used out of public sight. Otherwise, everything is brand new— gas lines, HVAC systems, and plumbing.

“The neighbors here have been fantastic,” said Arrowsmith. “The two things they said they wanted most was live entertainment and a private room for functions and we’re doing both.” The private room will accommodate up to 38 seats and a small stage near the front of the main dining room will allow for two or three musicians, he said.

Davis, who will serve as general manager, said the bar will include a chilled-glass system, which will allow every pint poured to be ice cold. Arrowsmith added that the bar will also feature Dorchester’s largest variety of whiskeys, with more than 50 different labels on offer.

“We are really looking to give the neighborhood something different,” said Arrowsmith. The eatery will eventually serve breakfast, lunch and dinner, but will begin with just dinner during a soft opening period.

“We’ll have a great menu, from flatbreads and seafood to steaks— and an amazing burger,” he said. And, of course, this being Adams Corner— a full Irish breakfast.

Industry, at 760 Adams St., will sit in a village that has become a mecca for pubs and a diverse range of dining options. Eire Pub, Lucy’s, Molinari’s, Blasi’s, and Landmark—another new eatery that has opened in what was once Gerard’s – are all booming at the moment.

“We think we will get a lot of people from around the village who’ll want to walk here,” said Arrowsmith, a native of Ireland’s County Louth. “It’s going to be a neighborhood place.”

Employee shot at Bowdoin Street office

An employee at College Bound Dorchester is recovering after being shot at its 222 Bowdoin St. location around 3 p.m. last Thursday.

In a statement, Mark Culliton, CEO of College Bound Dorchester, said: “We have since learned that his condition is stable, he is recovering and we are incredibly thankful for that. We do not have any information about why or how the shooting occurred.

“We know that the investigation is underway. We remain committed to our work and to the day in the near future when incidents such as these are a thing of the past. It is with this resolve that we move forward. For now, we are focused on supporting our staff and students, and we have counselors available for them. We are grateful for our network of community partners and friends who have reached out to offer comfort and support.”

College Bound Dorchester works with young people in gangs or with criminal records to get them into local community colleges, such as Bunker Hill Community College and the Franklin Institute.

Police raid alleged drug den on Nazing Street

Boston Police disrupted an alleged crack cocaine ring on Nazing Street with a raid on Tuesday morning. A police account of the operation— led by a SWAT team— claims that officers arrested three men on drug and weapons charges and confiscated 33 bags of crack cocaine and two firearms, along with digital scales.

Capuano discusses Syria, federal priorities at Mattapan session

Separately, Rep. Lynch weighs in on Trump’s Syrian missile strike

By JENNIFER SMITH
REPORTER STAFF

National issues consumed the conversation at a town hall meeting hosted by US Congressman Michael Capuano in Mattapan on Monday, with the congressman fielding questions from constituents on Syrian airstrikes and on what the state’s congressional can do about the impact of national policy in a deep blue state.

Elections have consequences, Capuano kept noting throughout the meeting, and Republican-controlled executive and legislative branches necessarily limit Democratic options on policy actions.

Capuano reminded those gathered in the Mildred Avenue Community Center auditorium that the Democratic Party “is not a monolith,” nor is Congress as a whole. “We do fight, a lot,” he said, “but we fight about important issues that have real and serious impacts on people’s lives and are deeply emotional to all of us.”

Capuano advised attendees to brace for a drawn-out congressional struggle, with Democrats largely limited to playing defense. To a woman concerned about her husband’s legal status as the immigration and deportation actions ramp up around the country, Capuano advised her to reach out to his office, but cautioned “it’s going to get worse.”

Conversation on President Trump’s emphasis on more military funding dominated a segment of the meeting as the conversation turned to the US airstrikes on an air base in Syria in response to a chemical attack on a population center that US intelligence says was orchestrated at the direction of Syrian President Bashar al-Assad.

“The images from Syria are heartbreaking,” Capuano had said in a statement following the strikes. “So many innocent people were brutally murdered with poisonous gas at the direction of Syrian President Bashar al-Assad. I do not dispute that Syria has again used chemical weapons against its own people in contravention of international law and morality, as well Representative Michael E. Capuano (middle) is pictured with elected officials on hand at the Mildred Avenue Community Center on Monday. From left, City Councillor Tim McCarthy, Sen. as its own assurances to the Security Council that it would not do so. I also share President Trump’s outrage about these atrocities.”

The congressman, however, takes issue with the circumstances of the retaliation. He and US Rep. Walter B. Jones, Jr. (R-N.C.), filed a bill last week that would prohibit the use of members of the United States armed forces in carrying out offensive combat operations in Syria and require the president to seek authorization from Congress before engaging in what could be considered an act of war.

“The question is, if we’re willing to go to war, it should be decided by the United States Congress on behalf of the people we represent,” Capuano said at the meeting. “First of all, that’s in the Constitution, and second of all, I don’t think we should be allowed to go to war by the decisions of one person.” Capuano was one of four members of Congress who, in 2011, sued President Obama in an attempt to force him to seek congressional approval for bombing Libya.

Congressman Stephen Lynch also weighed in on the Syrian situation on Monday, calling into Boston Herald Radio while on a trip to Kuwait and Iraq to say that US allies in the region largely approve of the military action. “I think it’s nearly unanimous in terms of this region that they were very supportive that the United States government took action and hopefully that will change Bashar Assad’s conduct going forward, at least with respect to the use of chemical weapons,” he said.

In a statement sent to the Reporter on Tuesday, Lynch asserted that the world should unequivocally oppose the use of chemical weapons against civilians and children. “While the US missile attack against the Assad regime airfield in Syria was a tactical and limited response, it is an unmistakable demonstration that the wanton, barbaric, and mass extermination of innocents will not be tolerated,” he said. “Now, moving forward, we must stand united and resolute with freedom-loving countries around the globe to demand that the Assad regime answer for its crimes against humanity.”

At the Monday meeting, Capuano made note of Trump’s opposition to intervention in Syria in 2013, in which the then-private citizen tweeted that President Obama should “get congressional approval before attacking Syria.”

The fundamental issue, Capuano said, is that no bill can get to the floor of the House without the majority party -- Republicans -- agreeing to take it up. The American people, by way of their elected representatives, are owed an open and public hearing when the commander-in-chief makes the case for military action, he said.

“If you want neat, you need a dictatorship,” Capuano added. “Democracy is messy.”

Dot’s Blakeley is one of two Campbell scholarship winners

BY ELANA AURISE
REPORTER STAFF

UMass Boston has a special connection with Krystle Campbell, who was killed in the 2013 Boston Marathon bombing. The Medford woman attended UMass Boston from 2005-2007 and received a degree posthumously.

In 2013, UMass Boston established the Krystle Campbell Scholarship Fund to carry on her legacy. Every year, the fund grants two undergraduate female students pursuing a business degree with a $5,000 scholarship.

The scholarship fund is backed by donations and the Krystle Campbell Scholarship Marathon Team. The scholarship fund has raised $680,000 towards their $1 million goal.

Krystle Campbell Scholarship recipient Eden Blakeley '18 of Dorchester poses for a photo with UMass Boston Chancellor J. Keith Motley and Krystle's father Bill Campbell at the Krystle Campbell Peace Garden in Medford.

UMass Boston hosted the scholarship presentation at Krystle Campbell Peace Garden in Medford on Sat., April 8. Before the event, the Marathon Team ran a mile through Medford, past the Campbell home and to the celebration.

The recipients of this year's Krystle Campbell Scholarships were Eden Blakeley '18 of Dorchester and Leona Smith '17 of Revere.

Blakeley hosted a fundraiser in New York City with two of her friends at Mercury Bar in 2013 in memory of those who had lost their lives and in support of those who had been affected. They raised $4,000 and donated it to the Jeffrey Coombs Memorial Foundation to help assist families and victims in need.

"Simply receiving a scholarship would have been amazing, but to have it in [Campbell's] name has changed my outlook quite a bit and I want to stay connected and involved in this foundation's community," said Blakeley. "The ceremony was incredible, and it was very emotional having Krystle's father there, and the runners with their families. The highlight for me was being able to see the [Medford Mayor Stephanie Burke] and Krystal's family put down flowers at her memorial site."

Blakeley is a Management major with a concentration in International Management. She hopes to one day work for the U.S. Department of State.

The goal: help Dot families break the cycle of poverty

create a sustained multi-generational pipeline within a single family who can lift themselves out of poverty together. "The program [LIFT] is not going to be a bunch of numbers that we collect about people," she said. "It's about individual families that we'll keep track of, so that we can really understand the process of improving people's lives."

The first year of LIFT will be focused on coaching parents, with the same skills taught to the children later. Mutual goals are set between parents and children, so that they can stabilize their family unit. "I grew up in a family that really had no money," said Ullian. "My father was from Russia and didn't even speak English; we were a typical immigrant family in Canada. What my parents did have, and why my sister and I succeeded, was lots of aspirations for us."

Ullian plans to stay involved with the program as it progresses. "I'm going to be a pain in the neck," she said jokingly.

The Ullian Institute will broaden the club's approach to helping families on the edge of poverty, said Bob Scannell, the president of the Boys and Girls Club of Dorchester. "For families living on the edge, it doesn't take much to go into a spiral," he added.

The club is already regarded as the neighborhood's premier safe haven and launch pad for children with its more than 200 programs offering art, music, sports, inclusion and tutoring. In preparing teenagers for college, as well as helping children with special needs, the club provides everything it can — from swimming lessons to a hot meal. The club serves more than 300 meals every evening during the school year, and many more during peak summertime programming, to feed children who otherwise may not get a decent meal at home.

"A zip code shouldn't determine a child's life," said Kinsella, who noted that many of the club's families are impoverished despite having two parents working. The stigma of poverty follows kids throughout their childhood, and can give them a sense of shame as they get older, she said.

Ullian's generosity extends far beyond her donation of money, said Kinsella. Her background in child development, and her willingness to spend hands-on time at the club, makes this partnership a special one. "It's a personal relationship with someone who is so knowledgeable, and who is really going to work alongside us," said Kinsella.

Ullian, who sees piloting a program as akin to "building a plane while flying it," said, "We're going to learn together. I have no greater joy than giving to organizations that help kids."

PROJECT DESCRIPTION:

Following a successful Open House on March 8th, where over 180 residents and stakeholders shared their ideas with City staff, we invite members of the public to join a Walk and Bike Tour of the study area.

The purpose of the Walk and Bike tours is to get to know the study area and continue the dialogue about priorities that will shape the PLAN: Glover's Corner planning study. We will examine the existing neighborhood assets; areas that could be enhanced; as well as opportunities for growth.

The Walk tour will be about a mile long and will be moderately paced. The Bike tour will be two miles long and require participants to have a working bicycle and helmets. People of all ages and abilities are welcome to join.

In March, the BPDA launched a question campaign to solicit feedback from the public for the first phase of the community planning process. You can submit questions that will help shape the planning study online at: <http://bit.ly/PlanGlovers>.

We look forward to having you join us! Please RSVP at <http://bit.ly/PlanGlovers>.

Artists seek to bridge Shakespeare gap in Codman performance

By RYAN DALY
REPORTER CORRESPONDENT

The life and work of William Shakespeare will get a contemporary treatment at the Codman Square Branch of the Boston Public Library on Thursday, April 20, in an event titled “Shakespeare to Hip Hop.”

Regie O’Hare Gibson, a 49 year-old poet and actor Marlon Carey, 39, along with several musicians, will lean on American musical forms including jazz, blues, funk, hip-hop, and even country to deliver an sweeping history on the background and influences of England’s seminal poet and playwright.

“I hope people leave with a more profound engagement with Shakespeare’s work than they do right now,” said Gibson. “Everything is done with live music, and the perfect audience is anyone from fifth grade, and up.”

The performance starts at 6:30 p.m. and runs for an hour-and-fifteen-minutes with influences ranging from Jimmie Hendrix to Kendrick Lamar.

Gibson’s pwn career started with a shaky approach to a microphone during a slam poetry event in Chicago.

“Fired my mind,” Gibson said, during an interview, referring to his first experiences in Chicago. “I knew I had to get into poetry.”

Gibson’s history in both Shakespeare and storytelling, though, started much earlier.

His grandfather, who was illiterate, used the invention of stories as a mnemonic device; this exposure to storytelling was formative for Gibson’s own performance abilities.

Gibson’s mother exposed him to acomplete anthology of Shakespeare’s work; he turned to this collection when he grew older and started falling in love. After watching a late 60s version of Romeo & Juliet, Gibson says the words started popping off in his mind.

The most difficult aspect to this upcoming performance, Gibson noted, was collecting the most contemporary scholarship on the mysteries surrounding Shakespeare’s work and life—not only to make sure the information presented is current, but also to make sure the liberties taken during the combination of poetry, rap, spoken word, and song are realistic.

“There are gaps in what we can know,” he said. “But we wanted to make sure we built the world around everything we did know right.”

Gibson got his Masters in Fine Arts in poetry from New England College and has lived in Lexington for the past decade. He teaches at Emerson College in the summer and will be teaching at both Lesley University and Clark University this coming fall.

Gibson stressed that immense work was done to keep the writing colloquial and entertaining rather than dry and akin to a lecture. The Codman Square Branch of the BPL is located at 690 Washington St., Dorchester.

New documentary focuses on Dot's own Daily Table

By ELANA AURISE
REPORTER STAFF

South Boston's Maryanne Galvin will debut a new documentary film that focuses on Dorchester's own Daily Table and other "food rescue" initiatives across the country at this weekend's Boston International Film Festival. The film "Seed & Sprout: Growing the Food Rescue Revolution" will be screened at 5:30 p.m. on Friday, April 14 at the Paramount Theater, 559 Washington St., Boston.

The documentary — Galvin's 11th in 17 years of filmmaking — will be followed by a Q&A with leaders in the movement, including representatives from Boston Area Gleaners, Food for Free in Cambridge and Daily Table.

Galvin is a full-time forensic psychologist who turned to filmmaking to shine a light on issues that she's passionate about.

"My educational background, training and professional experiences have definitely informed the decision to create person-centered stories to throw light on issues or challenges we all share as humans," said Galvin. "My goal is to create inspiring films that will contribute to the conversations about these topics and hopefully cause people to reconsider their attitudes through the power of cinematography."

Her previous films have tackled topics like the death penalty, children and youth, and aging. Seed & Sprout begs the viewer to reflect on their own choices and how we — as a society — can reduce hunger.

"My hope for the film was to raise awareness of the food waste issue, the impact on environment," explains Galvin. "In other words, use the film to move from awareness to action even if a viewer doesn't share concern about feeding his/her malnourished neighbor. The environment is where we all live. Why not learn more about it?"

"During the research phase I came across fabulous people and initiatives like Doug Rauch at the Daily Table," Galvin explains. "Doug's story, as well as the others in the film, embodies the struggle of many large and small food relief initiatives across the country."

Each in their own unique way, they explore solutions to the problem: How do we provide access to affordable nutrition and healthy meals, not just fill stomachs — to those who want and need it? Who, what, where and how is this being done and is it effective?"

Admission to Friday's screening is $12. Tickets can be purchased in advance bostoniff.org/attend/passes-tickets. View the film's trailer at the same site.

Dorchester residents Lekei Jacobs and Joann Antoine will be featured in the Freelance Players' upcoming original musical, "Mob Scene." The original musical stars 28 young actors, ages 12 to 16, from 12 Boston area communities. It was written by mystery writer Ned White, directed by Kippy Dewey of Jamaica Plain, and with a roaring 20's score by Narcissa Campion. Mob Scene will be performed on Friday, April 28 and Saturday April 29 at 7:30 p.m., and Sunday, April 30 at 2 pm, the Park School, 171 Goddard Ave., Brookline. Suggested donation at the door: $10 adults, $5 children. For more information call 617-524-7045 or visit freelanceplayers.org. Joshua Lavine photo

Little Miss, Young Miss contest set for April 29

Girls ages 7-12 interested in participating in the annual Little Miss and Young Miss Dorchester contests still have time to sign up. The deadline for applications — which are available for download online at DotNews.com — is Monday, April 24. The contests will take place on Sat., April 29 at 10 a.m. at First Parish Church, 10 Parish Street, Meetinghouse Hill. Both age groups will be together for this event with all winners announced at the end of the day.

All girls entering this contest must be residents of Dorchester and must be available to participate in the Dorchester Day parade on Sun., June 4. Their parents must provide a birth certificate if chosen as a winner or runner-up and attach their response to one of the offered questions — such as, "Describe your favorite place in Dorchester" — on the application and recite their response the day of the contest.

Little Miss contestants must be 7-9 years old and Young Miss contestants must be 10-12 years old on the day of the contest. Please enclose a photo of the contestant no larger than 4x6 will be used to help the judges deliberate. All photos will be returned on the day of the contest.

The winner and runners-up must sub-

The Boys & Girls Clubs of Dorchester celebrated the dedication of a new outdoor playground at the Paul McLaughlin Site on Dorchester Avenue on April 2. The new space — called Victoria's Playspace — is named for Victoria McGrath, a young woman who was injured in the 2013 bombings on Boylston Street and later died in an unrelated car accident. The play space was created over three days by "Where Angels Play," a group that came together after the Sandy Hook tragedy in Connecticut. This project at BGCD is being spearheaded by Jimmy Plourde, a local firefighter who aided Victoria after the attack, who saw this as an opportunity to inspire and uplift joy in memory of a person who changed his life forever. The playground features natural elements and materials and was designed by Picerno Giordano Construction, with input and inspiration offered by Victoria's parents, Jim and Jill McGrath.

Motley’s forced exit is shameful

Last week’s forced resignation of UMass Boston Chancellor Dr. J. Keith Motley – who will leave his post in June amid a chaotic debate over the campus’s finances and future— is a bitter pill to swallow in this neighborhood. While Motley is not without his flaws, his ten-year tenure has been marked by unprecedented growth in the Dorchester campus’s size, prestige, enrollment, and potential. For the Motley era to end in such an ignominious manner is a shameful moment, not only for the UMass system, but also for the city and the commonwealth, where Keith Motley has become one of the preeminent leaders of his generation – of any color.

It is highly unlikely that the decision will be reversed, and Motley’s statements indicate that he is resigned to the transition. But, let there be no doubt: There is no addition by subtraction in the rush to force Keith Motley from his leadership post at UMass Boston.

The university will be weakened as it loses his unique perspective on UMass Boston’s mission, the hard-earned goodwill and respect that he has won in the neighborhoods we cover, and, critically, his sincere devotion to balancing the core mission of this university with the realities of its tremendous growth over the last decade.

No one individual is more responsible for the success of UMass Boston— which cannot be measured simply on a spreadsheet. Motley is the heart and soul of the place itself, and in driving him from the campus— no matter how UMass board members and their president want to frame it— they have done a disservice to the man and to the campus.

If there are systemic failures in the UMass budget system— and there no doubt are— it defies common sense to presume that they will be ameliorated by Motley’s removal. Where is the accountability on the university’s board of trustees, who are ultimately responsible for approving spending and the building projects that are at the root of the deficit? What of the “quasi-public” UMass Building Authority, which is charged with planning, financing, and approving construction projects— all of it done without the benefit of scrutiny from local planning boards— like Boston’s BPDA. (Legislation that has been introduced to change that exemption from local control is one of the measures that should be fast-tracked to fix this glaring gap in accountability at UMass.) How about the state’s Division of Capital Asset Management (DCAM), which is supposed to track day-to-day progress on construction jobs and rein in cost overruns? When will the leaders of these less-visible but powerful state boards have to answer the tough questions that only Keith Motley, to date, has had to shoulder?

We’ve not always agreed with Dr. Motley. The lingering impasse at Bayside Expo Center, for example, began when he engineered the site’s purchase in 2007. It was a bold move and— from the UMass perspective — a master stroke. But it has been poorly managed. Motley’s push to link the Bayside site’s future to the ill-fated Boston 2024 gambit was ill-advised. But imbroglios such as the Olympics fiasco were the collective work of a cadre of city and state leaders— elected and unelected— who’ve created confusion and delay in the redevelopment of this waterfront section of Dorchester.

Hovering out of public view amid the onslaught of negative press that preceded Motley’s removal this month is an ongoing, secretive effort aimed at delivering the Bayside parcels to Robert Kraft and his private sports and entertainment venture. UMass president Martin Meehan has all but endorsed the idea, promising a windfall for the cash-strapped campus. The fact that these talks with a private entity— leveraging land held by the state’s public university— have been happening without public scrutiny is itself a scandal in the making.

Could it be that the real motive behind this campaign to discredit and jettison Keith Motley was the removal of a potential obstacle to a privately built stadium on Columbia Point? We’ll know soon enough.

In the meantime, as angry students on the UMass campus might say: Stay woke. The powerful forces complicit in this assault on Keith Motley themselves need to be held to account.

‘...First time I’ve felt free since I’ve been out’

Sean Ellis brings his story to Innocence Project conference

By ELAINE A. MURPHY
SPECIAL TO THE REPORTER

Sean Ellis, a former Dorchester resident, recently traveled to San Diego as a guest of The New England Innocence Project to participate in the annual conference of the Innocence Network Conference, an affiliation of 56 US and 13 non-US organizations with a mission of “providing pro bono legal and investigative services to individuals seeking to prove innocence of crimes for which they have been convicted, and working to redress the causes of wrongful convictions.”

More than 550 people attended the gathering, including 150 exonerees, and Valerie Jarrett, former White House advisor to President Obama, was the keynote speaker.

Ellis, who was accompanied by his sister, Shar’Day Taylor, a state of Massachusetts social worker, brought a singular experience to the conference: In 1995, despite his insistent declarations of innocence, he was convicted – at his third trial after the first two resulted in hung juries – of the 1993 murder and armed robbery of a Boston detective. A 1998 motion for a new trial and a subsequent appeal were both denied, and he ultimately spent more than 22 years in prison until the Boston defense attorney Rosemary Scapicchio took up his case, and, in 2015, convinced a Suffolk Superior Court judge that, due to police misconduct and prosecutorial lapses, he deserved a retrial. Ellis was quickly released, and now, at age 43, he is free on bail awaiting word from Suffolk County prosecutors on a date for his fourth murder trial. Ellis needed a court’s permission to travel out of state and temporarily remove the GPS ankle bracelet that he wears 24/7. Chief prosecutor Edmund Zabin objected to his travel, telling the hearing judge, “He never should have been let out” – this despite the unanimous affirmation of Ellis’s wrongful conviction by the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court in 2016.

For all that, the trip was a thrill for Ellis; for one thing, it marked the first time he’d been on an airplane. He excitedly filmed the takeoff on his smartphone.

“It was the first time I’ve felt free since I’ve been out,” he said.

“There was never a dull moment” for him at the conference, said Ellis, who attended such workshop sessions as “Social Media: Power, Presence & Purpose.”

At the “Moth Storytelling” workshop, he and more than two dozen other released inmates were allotted five minutes each to tell their stories onstage. Sean, by now a seasoned speaker at various forums around Boston, found this a huge challenge. How to compress all he’d gone through into five minutes?

He focused on two life-changing days: The first was September 26, 1993, when he was 19. He walked into a 24-hour drugstore in the early morning hours to buy a box of Pampers for his cousin, and “one and a half weeks later I was arrested for murder.” On that day at dawn, Boston Police Detective John Mulligan, who was guarding the store from his SUV parked in the fire lane outside, was murdered as he slept in in the

the police officers had been leading double lives – conducting a longstanding on-the-job enterprise of falsifying warrants and robbing drug dealers – made Ellis realize there was a bigger story going on behind the scenes.

The courts agreed. As Chief Justice Ralph Gants wrote in the SJC’s 2016 ruling, “We did not know at that time that these detectives had been engaged with the victim in criminal acts of police misconduct as recently as seventeen days before the victim’s murder. The complicity of the victim in the detectives’ malfeasance fundamentally changes the significance of the detectives’ corruption with respect to their investigation of the victim’s murder.”

Ellis concluded his San Diego talk by admitting that while he had lost faith in the system over the course of his long imprisonment. he never lost faith in himself. “They could not take that from me,” he said. “As he saw it, in prison offered two choices: either be consumed by the negative environment or grow. I chose to grow.”

That he did. He earned a paralegal degree by correspondence course, got in touch with his emotions through the prison’s “Jericho Circle” chapter (“In prison you grow callous,” he says), and received counseling training in the “Second Chance” program of mentoring youthful offenders.

Asked what he’d like people to know about his conference experience, he pointed to a photo on the backdrop of the stage proclaiming a total of 2,953 years of wrongful incarceration endured by those telling their stories. Even so, “The stage had a certain feeling to it,” he said. “It was of love, compassion... maybe even warmth. It felt comforting and warm. There was none of the tension of prison. It was just beautiful.”

Ellis wants to share the lessons he drew from attending the conference: “This feeling can exist” in the hearts of people who’ve been wrongfully imprisoned, people with every right to hold unrelenting bitterness against the system. In short, people, like himself, who’ve chosen to grow.

The second day was when his lawyer brought to him in prison the FOIA information that had begun arriving, after an 8-year wait, detailing crimes committed in the 1990s by John Mulligan and three other Boston detectives. The surviving trio investigated Mulligan’s murder and marshaled every piece of evidence used against Ellis. That

UMass community decries impact of budget cuts

“What is most upsetting to me is that we have to constantly come to this board and ask for respect, something that should be at the forefront,” said Janelle Quarles, president of the Classified Staff Union, which represents employees. “This last year at UMass Boston has been a trying one to say the very least ... we still cannot get a straight answer from anyone when we ask about the cuts or the rumors and only when there is a breaking news story do we have confirmation that there has been a change that could significantly impact students and staff.”

Under Motley’s tenure, UMass officials have noted, enrollment grew by 25 percent, student retention and six-year graduation rates had risen notably, research funding had increased by 53 percent, and the school had opened the campus’s first new academic buildings in decades.

UMass president Marty Meehan praised Motley in an announcement last Wednesday after the chancellor’s resignation. “Chancellor Motley is an inspirational leader whose decade at the helm of UMass Boston resulted in strengthened academic programs, increased enrollment, and the transformation of the campus,” Meehan said. “He concludes his tenure as chancellor having successfully elevated the institution while preserving its vital mission and its contributions to the City of Boston and the Commonwealth.”

All of which came with growing pains. A series of Boston Globe articles since mid-March had laid out the institution’s financial struggles, which the central office cites as up to a $30 million deficit, reduced fundraising, and an enrollment decline between 2015 to 2016.

The Globe articles documented warnings going back to 2012 that the campus, dealing with overruns in a $750 million long-term facility and infrastructure construction project, was feeling the financial crunch.

Given his impending departure, some city and state leaders worry that Motley — a popular black leader at the helm of the prominent Columbia Point university, and until Robert E. Johnson was named UMass Dartmouth chancellor last month, the only black UMass chancellor — could see his reputation tarnished by the circumstances of his resignation, which they see as targeting him alone for the financial issues.

State Sen. Linda Dorcea Forry said last week that the steady drip of news has effectively led to Motley being “systematically discredited and removed over the past few months,” which sends a “disturbing message.”

More importantly, Forry said, “we keep talking about the budget deficit, and yet he’s not the sole decision maker.” The board of trustees, the UMass Building Authority, the president’s office, and the state Division of Capital Asset Management and Maintenance all play a role in approving budget and construction decisions at UMass Boston.

“I believe in accountability, efficiency,” said Forry, who is married to Reporter editor Bill Forry, “but it wasn’t just Dr. Keith Motley who did the construction.” At a meeting of the Board of Trustees on Wednesday of this week she again called on the board to reject Motley’s resignation.

According to university data, enrollment at UMass Boston declined from a record 17,030 in the fall of 2015 to 16,847 last fall, a decrease that capped a steady but slow-ing year-to-year increase since Motley’s leadership began. Per-year applications over the decade increased from 5,192 to 15,539, although the percentage of admitted students who then enrolled has dropped.

Last December, Motley implemented austerity measures to address a roughly $26 million deficit, based on recommendations from the university’s budgeting committee.

Three months later, UMass management brought in Barry Mills, former president of Bowdoin College in Maine, to run the school as its chief operating officer. With Motley’s resignation, Mills will not be a candidate for chancellor, according to Meehan, but will serve as interim chancellor beginning July 1 “until finances are stabilized and the university is positioned to attract a world-class chancellor through a global search.”

Some elected officials said Motley’s departure from university leadership took place under lamentable circumstances.

The chancellor was “working through an ambitious and difficult master plan,” said state Rep. Dan Hunt.

“In reference to the way he’s exiting,” Hunt added, “it’s unfortunate that decisions made by the board of trustees along the lines of capital financing and other decisions are what reflects the economic position of UMass Boston, and it’s very disappointing that the board sought to air their grievances through the media.”

After a Massachusetts Democratic Party platform hearing last Thursday night, Suffolk County Sheriff Steve Tompkins said he was not comfortable weighing in on any political machinations, but he lauded Motley’s impact on the school and the city.

“I echo what everyone says about Keith being an inspirational leader,” Tompkins said. “I think he’s a pillar of strength, and not only that, but of encouragement. And to lose him, on one side of the coin, I think is a bad thing. But on the other side of the coin, I think that in the last ten years, between ’07 and now, he has established a presence for education, for inclusion, and I think that his legacy will go far past the ten years that he was actually in that chancellorship.”

Tompkins said he is “heartened” at the prospect of Motley’s continued presence on campus as an educator.

Motley will take a pay cut in his new contract. His salary as chancellor was $422,000 last year. As a professor, he will be paid $240,000.

Mayor Martin Walsh has not yet commented on the chancellor’s departure, but City Councillor Tito Jackson, who is running against Walsh for mayor, concurred with Sen. Forry’s call for Meehan to refuse the resignation, as have other Motley supporters, including a group who rallied at the State House on Saturday.

Jackson noted the various other entities that approve decisions to finance and build on the public university’s campus. Given the growth of the school under Motley’s leadership, Jackson said, he objects to the chancellor being singled out for all failings.

“It is shameful that his reputation, his leadership skills, and his contributions are being discounted at a time when other UMass campus and leaders face the same challenges and conditions that Keith faced,” he said.

Motley says successor poised to ‘re-engineer’ the campus

institution, because it’s an institution that gets into your soul.”

Motley’s resignation announcement came about five months after he sent a letter to students and faculty announcing plans to deal with a $26 million gap in the nearly $430 million budget for the Boston campus, including cuts, a hiring freeze and furloughs.

The Boston campus had reported an expected $15 million end-of-year deficit to the university system in late January, and UMass officials said on Tuesday that that number is now down to $6 million to $7 million after a series of budget fixes.

said the school had made $4.7 million in “revenue changes,” of which $4 million came from fee changes for College of Advancing and Professional Studies courses.

UMass president Martin Meehan said the campus’s original budget plan, approved by trustees, called for $25.7 million in cuts to achieve the projected $2.3 million surplus at the end of fiscal 2017. He said the campus “waited too long to implement” that plan. “We’re moving forward,” he told reporters. “We believe that the failure here is more in execution of the plan that was presented to the Board of Trustees by the Boston campus. It’s more an issue of execution.”

Motley said his focus at the school has been on building its infrastructure and he described it as a “university on the move.” His interim replacement -- deputy chancellor and chief operating officer Barry Mills -- “will be known for reengineering this institution,” Motley said. “Barry and I will work together as we have been doing,” Motley said. “I have stayed out of his way to allow him to learn. I didn’t want to poison that. He knows that.”

Mills, the former president of Bowdoin College who joined the university last month, said the “core” of UMass Boston is strong, with “very impressive” students and faculty and a staff that works “tirelessly.” But he said the school must tackle a series of chronic, systemic problems and its budget process needs to “be fundamentally redone.”

He cited a variety of factors that have contributed to the school’s financial woes, including debt taken on for capital projects, “dramatically growing” depreciation of campus buildings, and enrollment numbers that did not meet “optimistic” projections.

“I’ve been on the job four weeks -- four weeks -- so I don’t have all the answers, and I don’t know all the problems,” said Mills. “And frankly, every day, there’s a new problem that has a lot of zeros, and it’s daunting.”

Meehan said that he and Motley jointly made the decision to bring Mills to UMass Boston. Motley plans to take a yearlong sabbatical and then to return to the campus to teach.

University officials said Mills is not a candidate to become the permanent chancellor of UMass Boston.

‘Participation’ ... ‘energy’ mark Democratic events as newcomers join the fray

(Continued from page 1) 20 individuals who had never before attended a caucus. In selecting delegates for the state convention on June 3, Ward 16 elected six women and four men who have never been to a convention, Hunt said. Including alternates, 15 out of the 27 delegates for the ward are new to the process and new to conventions.

One of those delegates is 46-year-old Erin Murphy, a Neponset resident who has participated in local politics from the outside but lately has found herself both frustrated and newly invigorated by recent events.

“I’ve always been active and engaged,” she told the Reporter, “but never in the actual political process. After 2016 election, which I felt was so troubling and disappointing to so many women, I felt it was time to get officially involved.”

She and her daughter, Margaret Whalen, 19, campaigned in New Hampshire for Hillary Clinton. She recalled their staying up until 2 a.m. together, “feeling the initial shock as I watched the map. Just the shock at first, just as you figured out what happened.”

A long-time teacher at the Richard J. Murphy School that bears her grandfather’s name and now at the Henderson Inclusion School, Murphy said the consequences of losing federal funding strike her personally. “The free lunch programs could be cut,” she said, “and on immigration, there are so many students in class who are undocumented and are worried now. And the environment. There are a lot of issues that you realize we will be hurt by, even though we voted against him.”

Whalen, a freshman at Bridgewater State University who voted for the first time last year, joined her mother at the ward meeting and ended up as a youth delegate. She is also politically engaged, in deep disagreement with Trump on several administration positions.

“I feel so strongly about women’s right to choose, and it’s frightening to think about,” she said.

“I always grew up with the women in my family saying how lucky I am and how easily that could be taken away from me. So this was taking fear and frustration and turning that into something positive, rather than just complaining.”

Speakers at a well-attended meeting of the state Democratic platform committee on April 6 at the Boston Teachers Union Hall at Columbia Point, the second in eleven such events planned through May, presented an agenda that called for increased emphasis on criminal justice reform, a bolstering of public education, action on climate change, and civil protections for immigrants and people of color.

“Economic justice has to be what the Democrats stand for,” urged former Boston City Councillor Charles Yancey, emphasizing the need to protect affordable housing units from privatization. “We should be fighting for contract compliance on all public and private contracts, and to work with our brothers and sisters in the unions to increase representation of women, and people of color in leadership of our unions,” he said.

A contingent of those who spoke highlighted the “Raise Up” bills asking for a $15 an hour minimum wage, paid family medical leave, and the fair share amendment, which would add a 4 percent tax on annual income above $1 million. The state of these issues are seen as increasingly dire under the Trump regime, attendees said. And the strong turnout at party events has reflected that sentiment.

Ann Clarke, the executive director of the Massachusetts Teachers Association, said that Nov. 8—“a very bad night for all of us in a lot of respects” — came with a bright side on the local front as the charter-cap expanding Question 2 was defeated by a 62 to 38 percent margin. She asked for increased and targeted support for public schools in the platform, “a very important document, something that you put together every four years and it sets the guideposts for moving forward. And I think this platform is a particularly significant one.”

Clarke, a member of the Ward 19 committee, which represents precincts in Jamaica Plain and Roslindale, said, “What we saw in January at the ward committee meeting was a lot of new people coming into the ward committee, so I think there is just a huge amount of interest right now in the party.”

Massachusetts Democratic Party chair Gus Bickford said after the meeting that the party as a whole has seen “significant energy and participation.” The numbers for turnout at party gatherings this year are “at least double, maybe more,” he said. And there is a difference in attitude now compared to late December and early January, he added.

“There was fear and no hope,” he said. I’m not saying the glass is half full now, but with the no vote on the Affordable Care Act [repeal], there is a recognition that this type of energy and participation is making a difference.”

Two Quincy leaders join Carney Hospital board

Thomas Farrington

Quincy businessman Thomas Farrington, founder of the Prostate Health Education Network, and Reverend Richard Man Chan Law, the pastor for the Chinese Ministry at Wollaston Lutheran Church in Quincy, have joined the Board of Directors at Dorchester's Carney Hospital.

Farrington founded the Prostate Health Education Network (PHEN) in 2003 following his treatment for prostate cancer in 2000. "His experience, advocacy and compassion for people in our community who are battling and recovering from prostate cancer makes his advice and experience invaluable," said Carney President Walter Ramos, who noted that PHEN is recognized as the leading prostate cancer patient education and advocacy organization focusing on African Americans, the population most impacted by the disease. Farrington has served on the board of the Greater Boston Chamber of Commerce; U.S. Export/Import Bank and was a member of the White House Initiative on Historically Black Colleges and Universities

Rev. Richard Man Chan Law arrived in Quincy in 1989 and has been a leader in developing programs which serve Asian immigrants. "Pastor Law's longstanding commitment to the Asian community in Quincy will provide Carney Hospital with insight and cultural sensitivity" said Ramos.

"We at Carney understand the importance of acceptance, knowledge, and awareness of cultural values to the healing process and overall well-being." Rev. Law serves as executive director of the Asian American Service Association. A native of Hong Kong, he earned a Doctor of Ministry at Andover Newton Theological School in Newton.

Can the Bruins make a run in the playoffs? It seems unlikely

Having scratched clawed, wiggled, and blustered their way into the two-month Stanley Cup festival, the Bruins now strive to see if they can last more than a week.

The smart money says: Don't bet the ranch on it. Just making this tourney, rightly considered the least to expect from any Bruins team, was struggle enough. It's not likely they're up to more. Bear in mind, their combined record against three key opponents this season – Washington, Ottawa, and Toronto – was 0-11.

Nonetheless, they do get credit for summoning the spunk to save their season with a six-game win streak down the stretch. Valorous were the two most vital wins in that surge, over the Islanders and the Blackhawks, both on the road under difficult circumstances and back-stopped improbably by a back-up netminder. The wins displayed a touch of grace under pressure sorely lacking when they blew playoff spots the two previous seasons.

But is that to be all there is? Probably! This is a team in transition. You may not recognize it a year hence.

With parity gripping the NHL to near paralysis, the margin between real contenders and mere pretenders is mighty thin. The Bruins edged closer to genuine validity this season. In the end, the difference was just a couple of points, another win or two. They had a chance for more only to have their best performer this season squander it rather stupidly in a classic example of this oft star-crossed team's historical penchant for bittersweet irony.

It was a burst of the childish pique that that was once not only acceptable but also celebrated back when this game was more colorful in a crude sort of way that inspired Brad Marchand to spear a Tampa defenseman in the gut and get himself suspended, clearly taking the wind out of his team's sails at precisely the season's most crucial moment.

Would the Bruins otherwise have come up with points in the final regular season's games that would have enhanced their post-season perspective, or at least avoided entering it on such a sour note. Doubtless it's a stupid question, but I say, "Yes!"

And it's truly a shame, in so far as it decidedly detracts from Marchand's fine story. Here's a kid from the sticks who came to the Bruins totally raw, undersized, and unheralded, and bullied himself into greatness through sheer will and boundless grit. But what he did to the Tampa slug, Jake Dotchin, was incompararably dumb, given the new rules by which he well knows the game is now played. Moreover, it painfully affirmed what many have long suspected, that such wayward tendencies are a fatal flaw in his otherwise admirable make-up. In this new game, that's a burden Marchand will find hard to shake, all of which he, however awkwardly, concedes. What a pity!

It's hard to quibble with this no matter your feelings about Marchand or his team or how the game has changed since "the good old days." It's also become hard to defend incivility. But it's equally difficult, may I suggest, to defend a capricious and arbitrary double standard. And of that, the NHL, and particularly its police department, are also profoundly guilty.

If Brad Marchand spears an opponent, hockey's gendarmes land on him like a ton of proverbial bricks; it doesn't matter that the victim of the attack was uninjured and missed only a couple of shifts, as was the case with Dotchin. Ah, but if Pittsburgh's Sidney Crosby, reigning NHL wunderkind, ends the season (maybe the career?) of an Ottawa defenseman named Mark Methot by viciously delivering a two-handed slash severing the tip of his finger, it goes un-penalized, un-investigated, and entirely ignored with those who dare even question the honor of 'Sid the Kid' being dismissed as impertinent.

This, old Sport, happened just a couple weeks ago. Nor did it matter that earlier that same week Crosby had leveled another opponent with yet another slash, for which he was neither rebuked nor penalized. I didn't see that one. But it has been described by those who did as also having been vicious. If the outside world regards shining superstar Crosby as hockey's young Lochinvar, it's because the league gleefully portrays him "the face" of their game. But inside said game, Mr. Crosby is regarded as no Lochinvar.

There's nothing new about this double-standard stuff. I recall vividly the evening a half century ago when Himself, Gordie Howe, ended the career of a harmless Bruins rookie named Billy Knibbs with a spearing so vicious Knibbs was rushed to a hospital with a ruptured spleen. Apparently the kid offended the Great One by looking at him cross-eyed, or some such. Knibbs never played again.

It wasn't right then anymore than now. But back then, they didn't have a Ministry of Good Behavior presumably policing the scene fairly, objectively, and without regard for reputation or stature.

And so we have Washington's Alex Ovechkin, in the regular-season finale, knocking Bruins rookie defenseman Brandon Carlo out of the game, and maybe the playoffs, with a bruising check, ramming his face into the glass and if it did not seem malicious, it was heavy, needless, and avoidable, and certainly worth at least two minutes in the sin bin. But there was no penalty for the Russian superstar nor will he get a date with the gendarmes.

Had Marchand delivered that blow, would the result have been the same? It seems reasonable to wonder. So, I do!

ARTS BASH EVENT SHOWCASES TALENT FROM WINTER SESSION

Film, Photography, Fine Arts, Music, Dance all display work, put on performances for parents and neighborhood

Winter Arts Bash at Boys & Girls Clubs of Dorchester was another smashing success. All the members of our Arts programs had a chance to show off their work from winter session during the event at the end of March. Our budding artists have spent months learning skills and technique related to film, photography, music, dance, drawing, painting, mixed media artwork and more. Arts Bash is an evening dedicated to displaying the work created throughout the session for friends, family and members of the community.

At Boys & Girls Clubs of Dorchester, we value the chance to showcase the talent and hard work of our members, not only for an outside audience but also for their peers and themselves. We hold Arts Bash at the end of every session to give everyone an opportunity to share their projects and be recognized for their creative efforts.

In a similar vein, Boys & Girls Clubs of Dorchester holds talent shows and open mic nights where members have a chance to share other passions and talents with their peers in a personal way.

Boys & Girls Clubs of Dorchester prioritizes an extensive Arts program that helps youth develop voice, creative confidence and problem-solving skills through art. As an organization, we recognize the importance of creating enriching programs that allow youth to develop skills relating to technology, design, visual communication and creative expression, just as much as those relating to more traditional academic skills. Having a chance to spend time immersed in the arts has tremendous influence on developing the ability for thinking creatively and strengthening a sense of identity and self-worth, as well as building vocational skills that may impact and guide a future career.

A real-world application of skills nurtured through these programs is the promotional flyer for the Arts Bash event, which was created in collaboration with members in the photography program. Part of Advanced Photo this session included a photography contest to help create the flyer. Raianne won Best Art Shot and Shawnice won Best Music Shot. Both winning photographs were used to create a professional flyer to promote the event.

This winter's Arts Bash included a photography exhibit by Beginning, Intermediate and Advanced Photography, which included portrait, still life, and landscape images. A selection of short films played on a projection screen showcasing the videography, acting and editing skills of the Beginning, Intermediate and Advanced Film members. A variety of pieces from Fine Arts were on display as well. Dance and musical performances rounded out the evening.

The event was a casual affair, with finger foods, raffles and the opportunity for family and community members to drop in and view artwork and performances and stay for as long as they wanted within the 90 minute window.

An Arts Bash is held at the end of each fall, winter and spring session. The spring session has just begun, and we will host another Arts Bash at the end of June to showcase the work created this spring. Many of the arts offerings are similar from session to session so kids have an opportunity to build upon and advance their skills, with new topics and techniques introduced each year as well. There are still openings in some programs, so if you are interested in getting involved contact the program director to check availability.

SHEA, Robert Charles 78, of Hanover and Mission Hill. Son of Charles and Margaret Shea, he lived in Hanover for most of his adult life after growing up in Mission Hill. Bob was a graduate of Mission High School and Boston College, and received his Master’s in Education from Boston State College. He began his professional career in the financial industry before becoming an educator. He served the City of Boston for more than 30 years, mainly at Dorchester High School. There he taught computers, distributive education and was a Varsity Soccer Coach. After taking an early retirement he briefly served as a tax professional in Dorchester, supported his wife Elaine in Real Estate before being elected in 2001 to the Hanover Town Clerk; he served in that position for 12 years and retired in 2013. He was very active in youth sports as a coach of his sons, Chris and Matt, in basketball, soccer and baseball. He was instrumental in starting the Hanover Youth Soccer program for under 8-year-olds, was on the leadership for Hanover Youth Athletic Association, CYO basketball and travel baseball and soccer teams. He also assisted his sons with Cub Scouts and Boy Scouts. He became very active in the Lions Club, served on the Hanover Board of Assessors and Park and Recreation Committee. Bob was also known to many as “Santa”, which was one of his favorite personas. He served the Massachusetts State Police and the Cardinal Cushing Center in Hanover for many years bringing the students to visit the New England Patriots and Boston Bruins. He also volunteered in Hanover at multiple functions annually to support multiple charities as Santa. Bob is survived by his wife Elaine, his son Chris and his wife Cherie with granddaughter Aurora and son Matt and granddaughter Odessa. The youngest of six siblings in the Shea clan, Bob was the last surviving member. His siblings included Dorothy Shack, Gladys Healy, Marie Blaisdell, Charles “Bud” Shea, and Lorraine Silvestre. Donations in Bob’s memory may be made to the Hanover Permanent Scholarship Fund in the name of Robert Shea.
