Back on the trail, Walsh says, ‘I feel comfortable where I am’

By JENNIFER SMITH
REPORTER STAFF

Mayor Martin Walsh says he’s not about to forget his roots. The Dorchester native, a former representative and civic leader, now the mayor of a city where no challenger has unseated an incumbent since 1949, is competing in what is generally considered an unbalanced two-man race against City Councillor Tito Jackson.

The first-term mayor sat down last week in the Reporter offices, two floors above his campaign headquarters in the Corcoran-Jennison office building on Columbia Point, for an interview about his campaign, his priorities for the city, and how he sees the tumultuous national conversation impacting Boston’s interests.

Two other candidates, James Wiley and Robert

Cappucci, have gathered enough signatures to make the ballot, but they face an uphill battle when it comes to overcoming name recognition and financing. In financing, at least, Walsh dominates all challengers with a $4 million war chest.

For all that, the race is hardly a foregone conclusion, Walsh said. “Listen, do I feel good about where I am today? Absolutely. I feel good because of the record, I feel good because of accomplishment, but I would never take anything for granted.”

Comfortable margins in Dorchester, South Boston, Mattapan, Roxbury, Hyde Park, and East Boston carried him to victory in 2013, he said. “Those areas I’ll never forget for putting me in this seat, and I’m fighting for every single vote in those areas, and I want to win those areas, and I want to win them

Next up in neighborhood lineup: Summer baseball in Fields Corner

By ROWAN WALRATH
GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

Children from age 8 to 13 soon will begin spending their summer under All Dorchester Sports & Leadership, playing baseball at Town Field in Fields Corner. The program is a learning opportunity: no experience is required to play.

“You don’t have to be a superstar baseball player,” said Candice Gartley, the program’s executive director.

The season starts on June 24 and will continue through the second week of August, Gartley said. Typically, events are peppered throughout the week: one game takes place during the week and one on Saturday mornings, and Gartley and her staff try to schedule a clinic during the week as well.

There is no hard deadline to register for summer sports, because many families “have a lot going on,” Gartley said. All Dorchester Sports & Leadership (ADSL) accepts registration over the phone and online and it has an online payment option.

Registration for wood bat baseball, for 8- to 10-year-old boys and girls, costs $50. The City Wide baseball program, for 11- to 12-year-old boys and girls, costs $60; Lou Tompkins, for 13- to 15-year-old boys, costs $65. Gartley said that there may be a summer softball program for girls

A teacher’s infant son has a rare disease, so students join a host of others in a quest for funds to seek a cure

Taylor Sabky is a 30-year-old math teacher at one of Dorchester’s most vibrant and diverse high schools, Boston International Newcomers Academy (BINcA) on Maxwell Street. In recent months, though, she has been working on a problem that resists solution on a classroom blackboard, and it has enlisted her school community and scores of strangers in a campaign of compassion and hope.

Last October, her son Purnell was diagnosed with Niemann-Pick Type A, a genetic disorder so rare that it only affects 50 infants worldwide each year. Purnell is just over 13 months old, a marker of age that speaks to the urgency attached to his diagnosis: Complications associated with the disease – mental deterioration, loss of body movement, and widespread lung damage – typically begin between the

Tom English bar, Dot Market to be sold; mixed-use pitched

By JENNIFER SMITH

Tom English’s bar and the adjacent Dorchester Market— two longtime businesses on a prominent Dot Ave corner in Columbia-Savin Hill— are under agreement to be sold this summer with the next owner eyeing a mixed-use project for the site. The buyer is Adam Sarbaugh of Cornerstone Real Estate, who discussed his plans with the Columbia-Savin Hill Civic Association’s planning committee on Tuesday evening.

Sarbaugh will purchase 951-959A Dorchester Avenue, a roughly 11,500 square foot parcel including the bar, the Dorchester Market, and a lot in between. Discussions started “a few weeks ago,” said attorney Joseph Hanley of McDermott Quilty Miller, who is representing Sarbaugh.

Dot third grader leads student effort to assist St. Jude’s

St. Jude’s Children’s Research Hospital received an unexpected gift this week from Renaissance Charter Public School third grader Tamil Burnett, who used her voice to benefit a cause that was important to her. The Dorchester girl e-mailed the Head of School, organized a petition, presented her case, and gathered over 200 signatures to launch “Freestyle Friday” at Renaissance, a uniform-free day for students who donated $1 to assist St. Jude’s.

Burnett presented a check for nearly $3,000 to St. Jude’s Cancer Hospital in Newton on Monday.

Tamil Burnett

“She had her own clipboard, talked to students on her own and explained the rational and initiative,” said Alexandra Buckmire, the Head of School at Renaissance.

“I had lunch with Tamil and we started researching local charities in Boston. We came upon St. Jude’s because she felt that it was a wonderful program that helped parents and children,” said Buckmire. “I thought it was a great example of how strong a student voice can be. With all the things going on around the election, she still had a voice and it was great to see how she could effect change as a third-grade student. I was very impressed.”

Fugitive double-murder suspect captured in Haiti

A Boston man who fled to Haiti after he allegedly killed two sisters in a Harlem Street apartment in 2011 is in custody and back in the US to face murder charges after police found him hiding at his mother’s house on June 3.

Jean Weevens Janvier, 34, has been on the US Marshals’ 15 Most Wanted List since last February. He was indicted in 2012 for the murders of Stephanie and Judith Emile, who were found shot to death. A two-year old toddler was found nearby, unharmed.

According to a statement issued Tuesday, the U.S. Marshals Service said it “worked closely with the U.S. Diplomatic Security Service and a unit composed of Haitian National Police to prioritize this case and coordinate efforts to locate Janvier.”

He was caught by Haitian police in Santo, Haiti and his identity confirmed through fingerprints, the Marshals Service said. He was extradited on Tuesday after being held by Haitian police, who offered “exceptional performance” in capturing Janvier, according to a statement by the US officials.

“An extremely violent crime landed Janvier on our 15 Most Wanted list,” said Acting Director David Harlow of the U.S. Marshals Service in a statement. “Thanks to the tenacity of our criminal investigators and police cooperation at the local and international level, another dangerous fugitive is off the street and will face justice.”

Suffolk County District Attorney Daniel F. Conley said, “For more than five years, the family of two murdered sisters has waited patiently to see justice done. Today they are one step closer to that goal. Thanks to the strong interagency partnership among Suffolk prosecutors, the US Marshals Service, US Attorney’s office, Diplomatic Security Service, Boston Police Department, and Haitian National Police, we intend to speak for Judith and Stephanie Emile in a Suffolk County courtroom, where the voices that were stolen from them will finally be heard.”

UMass Boston dorms on track for an opening next year

By JENNIFER SMITH
REPORTER STAFF

Construction is plugging along on the 1,085-bed residence halls at UMass Boston, university officials told a small gathering of community members at the Campus Center last Saturday morning. The two buildings at the “gateway” to the Columbia Point campus off Mt. Vernon Street should be completed in time to open in the fall of 2018, they said.

The lightly attended meeting, held while the Pride festivities swamped downtown Boston, was “one in a series of community discussions,” said Ed Lambert, the university’s vice chancellor for government relations and public affairs.

Having occupied Columbia Point for more than 40 years in its 52-year history, UMass Boston is still seeking to expand its facilities and reputation as the city’s only public research university. Its master plan in 2007 recommended incorporating residential housing, Lambert said, “particularly from the perspective of promoting students success.” About 2,000 beds of on-campus housing was called for in the plan. The new dormitories, their elevator towers now rising over campus dirt piles, will together account for about half of that number.

The dormitory buildings will open the campus near the point where Mt. Vernon Street meets University Drive, between the UMass Boston softball field and the large Lot D parking area.

A larger “East Building” will rise in part to seven stories and ascend further to a dozen stories of residences, containing 804 beds in total. The dorms would partly surround a central one-floor 500-seat dining hall and amenities space. The smaller “West Building” is planned as a nine-story, 281-bed building with first floor common areas. An open courtyard and pass-through sits between the dormitories.

Administrators plan changes for the university to bring it up to a 24/7 standard of campus life, including increasing security staffing, changing operating hours for some amenities and the libraries in moves to bolster research opportunities. Some of these alterations will begin this summer.

“Quite honestly, we’re doing that in a way, through services, to benefit all students,” Lambert said, “not just the thousand students who are going to be living there. That’s a commitment that the university has made. It’s not inexpensive, but we recognize it as necessary for a public research university. And by the way, we are the only public research university in the country without residence halls.”

One attendee raised several questions about the potential student impact on the neighborhood as well as traffic and parking concerns due to construction vehicles parking along the main road. Lambert agreed that the vehicles should not be parked off campus in a way that inhibits other drivers, but he said the school is limited in its authority off UMass Boston property to do more than repeatedly raise the topic and push for better behavior from the construction teams.

On the subject of student life spilling out into the neighborhood, school leaders say having first-year students – and some transfers – living on campus should have a stabilizing effect on them when they move off-campus. UMass Boston in 2016 counted 4,113 undergraduates and 1,011 graduate students living in the Boston private housing market, both decreases since 2015, according to the city’s University Accountability Reports.

The report notes that the planned dorms align with Mayor Martin Walsh’s push to increase on-campus student housing to relieve the pressure on surrounding private housing markets.

Construction started in November 2016, with pile-driving complete and work under way on the steelwork. The buildings are expected to be substantially complete in July 2018, ready for occupancy that August, according to David Morrissey of Capstone Development Partners, a private developer working with the university on the project.

Mayor Walsh: ‘I want people to feel like they didn’t make a mistake when they voted for me in 2013’ good and big, and I want to let people know that I haven’t forgotten those neighborhoods.”

He added, “I don’t want to win this race by losing Roxbury and winning Beacon Hill. A win’s a win, obviously, but I want to win Roxbury, I want to win Mattapan, I want to win those areas that I won before. I want people to feel like they didn’t make a mistake when they voted for me in 2013.”

Walsh said he believes he has been successful in pushing out his message. “I feel comfortable where I am. I’m not gonna run away from my record,” he said, pointing to educational investments – the BuildBPS master plan will guide $1 billion of infrastructure improvements into schools over the next decade – and housing initiatives, particularly in areas of homelessness.

The city is housing 1,126 chronically homeless people in apartments, he said, 800 of them chronically homeless veterans. The system in place now, Walsh said, ensures that a homeless veteran who comes to the city for assistance will be in an apartment within six months. The prospect of ending chronic homelessness in the city by 2018 is now looking like “an obtainable goal,” he said.

The mayor said he wishes the city “were a little further ahead” on the public schools, which, he said, was pushed back during a search to fill the superintendent seat now occupied by Tommy Chang.

With housing as well, he said, “It’s difficult be ahead there because it’s a generational lack of building affordable housing. This is something we’ve only been doing for three years, that over the last bunch of years we haven’t really seen the growth in the city that we’re experiencing now.”

Walsh readily acknowledged the validity of the critique that a lot needs to be done to deal better with crime in the city.

“You know, last night [June 7] we had five shootings, so, even though we talk about being safe, we still have too many shootings,” he said. “We have too many homicides. We have 16 homicides this year so far, same as this time last year, which is you look at it compared to other cities in America. We’re low, but that’s still 16 homicides; 16 people lost their lives. So we can always continue to improve, [me] as a mayor, and as an administration.”

Since the interview, two more fatal shootings occurred in the city, both in Mattapan over a two-night stretch.

Walsh’s showpiece initiatives have proved to be a mixed bag. He angled for major projects like bringing General Electric’s headquarters to Boston, and he has pushed against those who would stop the Winthrop Square garage sale, the proceeds of which he wants to redistribute into outlying and underserved neighborhoods.

And he has not shied away from pursuing some large initiatives that were ultimately unsuccessful.

“Yeah, people will criticize me on some of the other things -- the Olympics and IndyCar,” he said. “I mean, we tried things. It didn’t happen. As a city, we’re gonna try. Why shouldn’t we try things?”

The impact of national affairs on Boston policy has been more and more a factor of late, with President Trump’s proposed budget and stated positions on climate change and immigration giving city leaders serious pause.

Mayor Walsh addressed a group of elder Bostonians who gathered at Venezia in Dorchester last week for a celebration of LGBT Pride Week.

Walsh referenced a story published in the Boston Herald, in which reporter Jordan Frias quoted residents asking the mayor to focus more on “local” issues like parking and crime, rather than climate change. The suggestion in that story that national or global policy does not measurably impact Bostonians rankles the mayor.

“Local? Immigration is local,” he said. “It affects Boston. The Affordable Care Act is local. It affects Boston and Massachusetts. The budget that Trump put out there is local. I mean, all the different cuts that he’s proposing in our city. Climate change is local. A good part of the city of Boston is in potentially dangerous areas with sea level rise and climate change. So that’s all local issues.”

Speaking of local, Walsh, a former president of the Columbia Savin Hill Civic Association, said that “being a civic activist and being in the mayor’s office, you get the appreciation for what happens in the community.

“There’s a lot of different pressures that a civic association has to deal with,” he said, “and it’s all volunteer. So I think it’s given me an understanding that the dynamics in a community can be tricky sometimes, but you have to understand that the people who show up at that meeting, most of those are the people who are die-hards for the community.”

Civics groups are not always representative of the whole community, he said, but they still serve as the place where the most engaged community members dissect the day-by-day neighborhood changes. “It’s the quality of life stuff that nobody talks about,” he said.

The Boston Planning & Development Agency (BPDA), formerly known as the Boston Redevelopment Authority, is rightly taking a cue from their historically poor reputation among neighborhoods and increasing neighborhood outreach well before a project is on the table, the mayor noted. The BPDA is a relatively new fixture in Dorchester, he said, with the exception of master planning processes.

“As a rep, I used to get kind of frustrated by watching development and growth happen all around Dorchester, and for years I felt we got dumped on a bit. The whole north-south Dorchester debate.... And we’ve watched areas change, in a positive way, and some people say in a negative way.”

The impression of development in South Boston, for instance, has been polarizing, he said. “But we haven’t see that [in Dorchester] for a long time, then overnight you start to see newer people coming into the neighborhoods. You see new restaurants... and now you’re starting to see that bigger shift happening and people are starting to invest in our neighborhoods. And I’m happy to see it as a Dorchester resident, but I also want to be careful that the shift isn’t so dramatic that we lose the longtime families that are here.”

Just last Sunday, Walsh marched along Dorchester Avenue for the annual Dorchester Day parade and pondered the changed face of Dorchester. He recalled that about two decades ago, mostly old Dorchester families lined the streets, a time that was followed by 15 years of “kind of a sad walk.”

Of late, Walsh said, there has been another change, and for the better. “It was a pretty well attended parade this year, and the faces were pretty diverse, a mix of a lot of different people,” he said. “So it was nice to see that Dorchester is continuing the diversity of our neighborhoods and seeing that people were actually coming out to watch the parade. I was excited to see that.”

Walsh: City must be ‘ready to act’ as development booms

By JENNIFER SMITH
REPORTER STAFF

As Boston experiences a population boom poised to put the city over the 700,000 mark, which will mean increasing pressures on the housing market, managing all the development is proving to be a beast for the Walsh administration. In an interview with the Reporter last week, the mayor talked about those pressures and the initiatives he has launched in response.

Development and Dot Ave.

“Savin Hill, Fields Corner: A lot of development is coming that way, and they haven’t really seen that in the past, and I think a lot of people are excited about it,” said Walsh. “But in the last three weeks, four weeks, the amount of space that Gerald Chan and some other folks are buying things up here in Dorchester, it means there’s development coming.”

He cited the pending sale of Tom English’s bar, the Dot Block mixed-used development in Glover’s Corner, along with the broader Glover’s Corner planning study, the purchases by Chan of the James Russell Engineering Works and the Spire Printing sites, and “other people quietly buying land up.”

“The Seaport is great, people love it, but what’s missing are middle-wage jobs, manufacturing jobs, where people don’t need a master’s or bachelor’s degree to work there,” he said. The administration has sought to identify areas where those jobs could logically fit.

Glover’s Corner could stand to see more mixed-use, office industrial, and high-tech manufacturing purposes, Walsh said. He added that the city needs to work to ensure “as we move forward, and as it changes and growth happens, [that]... it’s done in a respectful manner. ... I think what Dorchester needs is one of these projects to move. Either Dot Block needs to get a shovel in the ground, Tom English’s needs to get a shovel in the ground. Something has to move, and ... what I’d love to see before my time as mayor is over is some development happen rather than seeing people land-bank.”

About the Point

Acres of prime land around Columbia Point, Mt. Vernon Street, and the top of Morrissey Boulevard remain in limbo as Walsh seeks re-election. As to the Columbia Point Master Plan, published in 2011 after three years of planning, he said, “It’s possible that we’ll dust that off and re-look at it in some point in the near future.”

And the often grid-locked Kosciuszko Circle and the aging JFK/UMass station still await upgrades. “I think there was potential missed opportunity with the [New England] Revolution,” the mayor said. “Just to get the investment by the state, because the state was going to put in hundreds of millions of dollars to fix [the] circle.”

Like his neighbors, Walsh is keeping an eye on the Globe site, for which a second sale just fell through. “That’s important, because when the Globe gets sold, that developer’s not going to sit on that building,” he said. “That developer’s going to immediately act;

we need to be ready to make sure on that, because that could be the catalyst for this whole corridor.”

Affordable Housing

The Inclusionary Development Policy, overhauled last year, raised the required number of affordable units to be built off site during new large-scale construction projects from 13 to 18 percent. Walsh estimates the policy will generate $50 million annually. Walsh also highlighted the Community Preservation Act, passed last November, which levies a property tax surcharge to be used for affordable housing, green space, and historic preservation.

“We’re talking about major money every year going into affordable development once the CPA’s up and running,” he said. With the commonwealth facing a major revenue shortage, he said, “We’re not going to get the dollar-for-dollar that we were hoping, but if we could get a quarter for dollar for now, that’d be good, but we’re still going to raise about $16 million.”

Neighborhood Homes Initiative settling in

By JENNIFER SMITH
REPORTER STAFF

Moving into the grey and white house marked a new stage in the life of 24-year-old Renee Omolade. She had closed on the home on April 24, four days before her son was born, and a month later she stood on the porch in the bright sunshine holding him as city leaders and media milled around outside.

Omolade, a Boston native who went to Latin School and Emmanuel College, lives in one of the first houses to be available through the Neighborhood Homes Initiative (NHI), which kicked off in 2015 through the Department of Neighborhood Development.

"It's exciting because what we wanted to do when we talk about housing was to build more homes for people," Mayor Martin Walsh told Omolade as they sat in her living room. "Clearly, you're the perfect model of what we want to do – baby, family, home in the neighborhood."

The program aims to repurpose city-owned land by partnering with developers to construct neighborhood-cohesive housing, much of it designated as affordable for moderate- to middle-income residents.

More than 250 small city-owned parcels have been identified through the initiative, city officials say. There are 94 houses under construction or set to be completed in the next 30 days, another 42 parcels that have been formally conveyed to developers, and 62 parcels under agreement.

The two-bedroom, one-and-half bathroom house on Trull Street that Omolade now calls home is one of three in the "Trull and Ware" bundle. Another single-family house and one two-family house are posted on nearby Glen and Ware streets.

Both single-family homes were sold to residents making up to 80 percent Area Median Income.

"I've been in Boston my whole life," said Omolade, a program manager with The Lewis Family Foundation. "And this was a great opportunity for me to stay in the community and reinvest in the community... I'm 24 years old; I'm very young to be a homeowner, so it starts early, you prepare yourself early for that, to make sure that you can give your kids the things that I didn't have the opportunities to have."

Her house, and other NHI properties like it, fit into the surrounding area. Before any developer is selected or the parcels are sold, residents get to weigh in and approve preliminary designs. Upon receiving Boston Planning and Development Agency approval, the city selects small developers to purchase the parcels and construct the housing. Interested buyers are first vetted through the Boston Home Center, which offers classes and financing assistance to prospective first-time homebuyers. Individuals like Omolade enter a lottery through the center as new NHI properties near completion.

Walsh said the city still needs to be creative with much smaller parcels, some of which are barely 500 square feet and insufficient for normal housing construction.

The mayor also toured a building under construction in the Garrison Trotter bundle of homes, which are being helmed by George Chin and Arnold Johnson of the Roxbury-based Crosswinds Enterprises, which they started together some 37 years ago. Chin and Johnson plan to bid on other NHI project bundles.

Near the playgrounds at the Trotter and Ellis school, the Garrison

Mayor Martin Walsh visited new homeowner Renee Omolade and her son at the newly-built home in Dorchester that she purchased through the city's Neighborhood Homes Initiative.

Trotter neighborhood of Roxbury will soon see a burst of new housing. With 18 units across 11 buildings, a mix of single- and two-family homes and side-by-side duplexes will be available through the lottery.

The Garrison Trotter Neighborhood Association has "been very involved, very helpful," Chin said. "Working in the community, you want their input," he said. "That money should grow the community and go back into the community."

Through the NHI process, and building on decades of local good will, Chin said, "We are doing these things that would [otherwise] be impossible for us to do. Some people can't do this affordable building... We manage to use community people to build it in the community, and let the community continue to have these homes."

Both the property and the existing liquor license would transfer to Sarbaugh's control when the sale closes. A licensing hearing is scheduled for June 28 at 10 a.m.

Tom English is "no longer interested in running the Tom English concept there," Hanley said. They hope to retain control over the liquor license to help with long-term planning for the site, possibly including a restaurant component.

The Dorchester Market, a small but popular grocery and meat purveyor at the corner of East Cottage Street, remains part of the plan, Hanley said. They are offering the operator a new market space included in the mixed-use project.

Hanley said they do not have specific designs for a new building.

RODE architects, which is working on several other nearby projects, is attached to the Tom English redevelopment plan. The site location — near the JFK/UMass T stop with solid foot traffic passing through the area — means "it falls into this category of transit-oriented development," said Kevin Deabler with RODE Architects.

At this stage, "I envision it kind of as a mixed-use," Sarbaugh said. Whether condominiums or rental units, "I'm open to either, I'm listening to feedback both ways," he said. A restaurant or gastro-pub would also make sense in the context of the streetscape, Hanley said.

Sarbaugh has a "strong background in multi-family, residential, some mixed-use, condominium and apartments," Hanley said. A Mission Hill resident and real estate company owner, Sarbaugh said much of his property work is in Mission Hill. He has also worked on a condominium project on Harvest Street in the Polish Triangle, he said.

They are having discussions with their neighbor, College Bound Dorchester, Hanley said, to keep them apprised of any progress and help ensure that the project is "community-minded, community-focused first."

The site abuts College Bound's property at The Little House on East Cottage Street, which is also where the Columbia-Savin Hill group meets monthly during general session.

"We know that's a special building, and it's been a special building for the whole community," Deabler said. "So the fact that this is one of their key abutters right here, we're just working hand in hand with them, but we're just not at a point right now to sit down and say what it is. They hope to have more precise plans before the licensing hearing later this month."

The student-run Kitchen at UMass Boston serves the deserving, keeps food waste at bay

By JONATHAN INNOCENT
REPORTER CORRESPONDENT

A student-driven program at UMass Boston is helping to feed hundreds of hungry people in Dorchester throughout the year by repurposing leftover food to minimize waste while providing nutritious meals to the community.

The Kitchen at UMass prepares and serves about 200 meals a week during the school year, and 500 a week during the summer. “Campus Kitchens are about meeting the gap between the community inside the college and the wider neighborhood community and providing the resources and nutrients that they need,” said Rebecca Driscoll, the program coordinator at the UMass Boston site.

The program shares a unique connection with the Harbor Point community, where the students themselves deliver, prepare, and sometimes eat lunch meals with older adults who would otherwise struggle to get groceries without special transportation or be left to prepare food for themselves.

Since January of 2017, 236 volunteers have contributed 640 volunteer hours and 8,506 pounds of food have been recovered and transformed into 4,785 meals served around Dorchester, including to kids at the St. Peter’s Teen Center in Dorchester, the Walter Denney Youth Center (Boys and Girls Club of Dorchester), Hearty Meals for all in Somerville, and the Vinfen Organization for adult residents with disabilities. The program also has three summer camps to work with, the Talented and Gifted Program, Project Alerta, and Project Reach, where they serve snacks and lunches, and provide nutrition education classes for interested students.

Most of their food sites are accessible to people who can use campus shuttles or the T. Otherwise, partners farther from UMass Boston pick up and distribute food shipments with delivery trucks.

The number of meals served from the UMass site spikes in the summer since many kids who would typically get free and reduced lunches during the school year rely on summer camps for access to food during the summer.

desire of many UMass students looking for community service opportunities who also have a strong interest in reducing food waste. Student volunteers are the main ingredient to the Kitchen’s success; they plan the menus, get the food, run the cooking shifts, organize the drivers, and teach culinary skills to other students and adults. They also help to keep track of all of the paperwork, organize fundraisers, develop curriculum, and recruit new students to get involved.

“It’s been really neat especially to see student volunteers who live in the Boston community connect with other people who live in the Boston community that they haven’t known or met before,” said Driscoll. “Many of the [Harbor Point] residents that we serve are older adults and the students are young, from 15 to mid 20s; and that intergenerational connection is great to see. It’s really rewarding for both the students and the older adults that don’t really leave their homes.”

The Kitchen’s food is provided mainly by Sodexo, which is the food service provider for the UMass Boston cafeteria system. The Kitchen also has a partnership with Whole Foods and the Food for Free organization in Cambridge, both of which provide fresh produce to balance out the nutrition within meals.

The UMass Boston efforts is part of a wider network known as the Campus Kitchen Project which was founded in 1989 by Robert Egger, who developed the model from his own successful local community kitchen, the DC Central Kitchen. With its headquarters still in D.C., the Campus Kitchen Project has grown to establish 60 sites across the country, serving from the cafeteria kitchens of various colleges and universities.

St. John Paul II Catholic Academy graduates 66 students

Saint John Paul II Catholic Academy graduated 66 students from the Class of 2017 on June 8. Valedictorians Allison Samuels from the Lower Mills Campus, Vy Phan from the Neponset Campus and Jovanny Ortiz from the Columbia Campus, each led the crowd in the welcome, the Pledge of Allegiance and Prayers of Petition.

Two special awards are given out at graduation: the St. Brigid of Kildare Award and the Spirit of Saint John Paul II Award. The St. Brigid of Kildare Award is an award that remembers the legacy of the religious sisters of the Archdiocese of Boston, who opened and staffed Catholic schools for over a century. The award is given to a graduating student from each campus who has grown in integrity, character and love of God, exemplifying the life of St. Brigid of Kildare and the legacy of the religious sisters of the Archdiocese of Boston. The recipients were Djayden Brito from Columbia, Lufus Philip from Lower Mills and Anyssa Mitchell from Neponset.

The Spirit of Saint John Paul II Award is presented to a student from each campus who was selected by his or her peers as the student who most consistently fostered respect for all, exemplified the virtues of peace, love and patience and has lived his or her time at the Academy in the spirit of Saint John Paul II. The award was presented to Reanna Bhagwandeem from Columbia, Brianna Dorcelly from Lower Mills and Marc Murphy

This year, 100 percent of graduates were accepted to a high school of choice and received over $584,000 in financial awards. Some of the top high schools in the state will be destination for the graduates, including Archbishop Williams, Boston Community Leadership Academy, BC High, Boston Latin School, Cardinal Spellman, Cathedral High School, Catholic Memorial, City on a Hill Charter School, Cristo Rey, Fontbonne Academy, Matignon, St. Joseph Prep and Xaverian.

Regional director Kate Brandley addressed the graduates, reminding them, "You are called to use your gifts and talents to make the world a better place. We need your intelligence, creativity, musical and art ability to solve our world's problems."

Mattapan's Montissol joins Revolution's United Team

BY ELANA AURISE
REPORTER STAFF

Mattapan resident Lumene Montissol signed a contract with New England Revolution's 2017 Unified Team, which features seven Special Olympic athletes between the ages of 19 and 39 with and without intellectual disabilities.

Montissol graduated from Community Academy of Science and Health in Dorchester on Fri., June 9. She has a summer full of events planned as a member of the Unified Team starting with a home-and-home series with the Chicago Fire's Unified Team on June 17 at Gillette Stadium and on August 5 at Toyota Park.

The Unified Team was created by New England Revolution and Special Olympics Massachusetts to provide an environment of friendly competition and inclusion. New England Revolution has been in partnership with Special Olympics Massachusetts for the past ten years.

Montissol will be competing and working hard this summer, but can look forward to the third Annual Bowl for a Goal—the New England Revolution Charitable Foundation's bowling event presented by Arbella Insurance, which is set to take place on Wed., July 26 at Splitsville Luxury Lanes in Patriot Place.

The event brings together coaches, players, and fans of New England Revolution. Last year, the event raised over $75,000 for Special Olympic Massachusetts helping to provide year-round sports training, athletic competitions, and programming for more than 13,000 athletes with intellectual disabilities annually.

This summer kickoff event typically includes raffles, trivia, and a silent auction to benefit Special Olympics Massachusetts. The 3rd Annual Bowl for a Goal's time is yet to be determined, but updates or changes to the event can be found here: revolutionsoccer.net/community/bowl-for-a-goal.

Don't put a heavy tax burden on weed sales

A proposal by a group of state lawmakers that would impose a 28 percent tax on marijuana sales— instead of the intended 12 percent outlined in last year's ballot question—is bad policy. Not only does the proposal subvert the will of the electorate, which voted 54-46 last year to legalize pot sales in the state, but it would also serve to undermine the market by incentivizing the continuation of an illicit trade.

The Legislature has been trying to delay or defang the results of last year's ballot measure by amending the law before it goes into full effect. It is already perfectly legal to grow a limited amount for personal use. The reforms being debated now relate to how the state will regulate the commercial sale of the plant products, including edibles.

The House committee's plan, released Tuesday night, is more extreme than expected. One advocate for legalization characterized the proposal as a naked effort to repeal the law, adding: "We thought you wanted to damage or eliminate the black market, but instead you gave them reason to celebrate."

While that assessment may be a bit hyperbolic, other lawmakers— including Somerville state Sen. Pat Jehlen, agree that the House plan will likely "maintain the black market." She criticized the proposal and indicated that she'll push back.

"The voters should be able to trust us not to more than double the tax rate that they voted for," Jehlen told the State House News Service.

Another proposed revision is perhaps just as troubling. Under the House plan, a city council or board of selectmen could simply vote to ban marijuana shops in their town without a local referendum, as called for in the ballot question. That could have the effect of concentrating sales in certain places, including city neighborhoods.

The Legislature has a legitimate role to play in fine tuning laws, including those passed through petition initiatives. But why not allow the law—as written—to kick into effect and then, after a reasonable amount of time to assess its impacts, make adjustments?

We agree with proponents like Jim Borghesani, the longtime pro-legalization advocate, who said yesterday: "Its irrational tax increase will give drug dealers the ability to undercut the legal market, and its removal of authority from local voters will give a handful of selectmen the ability to overrule the opinion of their own constituents."

He's right. Let's get this show on the road. Keep the 12 percent tax, give voters in individual towns and municipalities the ability to advise and consent on pot shops, and stop throwing up unnecessary hurdles to a drug that is now legal to possess and use in Massachusetts.

Tap into Uphams Corner on June 20

Uphams Corner Main Streets (UCMS) will host its annual fundraiser on Tues., June 20, from 6 p.m. to 8 p.m. at the Kroc Center at 650 Dudley St. The Innovation in Uphams Corner event raises money to support the Main Street's district, but it's also a chance for residents, volunteers, financial supporters, and elected officials to meet local entrepreneurs and add input into new development ideas.

Dudley Street Neighborhood Initiative will have a table set up to solicit input on the future use of the Citizens Bank building on Columbia Road— an important, unresolved issue in the business district.

Sunday traffic snafu as Beades Bridge gets stuck, a rarity in recent years

By Bill Forry
Editor

The drawbridge that carries Morrissey Boulevard over the inlet between Dorchester Bay and Savin Hill Bay became stuck on Sunday evening, causing severe traffic delays that took hours to resolve. Repairs continued into this week, resulting in some lane restrictions on the busy waterfront thoroughway.

The problem started around 6 p.m. when the John J. Beades Bridge was opened to allow a boat to pass into Savin Hill Bay. As he began to close the span, the bridge operator spotted two people "trespassing" underneath the far side of the bridge and stopped the closure to "avoid injuring these individuals." It was then that the bridge became stuck in a partly open position and traffic topside came to a halt.

"The far side span was stopped immediately, but in doing so this resulted in the nearside span becoming stuck as the 'transition plate' on the roadway approach was caught underneath the 'heel' of the moveable span. The bridge operator could not fully lower the span or open the traffic gates for vehicles," according to a statement from the state's Department of Transportation.

It took work crews until just before 10 p.m. to fully lower the bridge. During that time, this key stretch of Morrissey, including the off-ramp from I-93, was closed off. More repairs were conducted the next two days, said MassDOT spokesman Patrick Marvin.

The bridge is inspected every two years and also gets a "special member inspection" each year to look at the safety of the concrete arches under the span, according to Marvin. It was due to be inspected again this month.

Named for a longtime Dorchester state senator, the Beades Bridge underwent a major, $9.1 million reconstruction over a two-year period between spring 2001 and summer 2003. Prior to the lengthy rebuild, the span was the source of frequent traffic headaches as it regularly got stuck in the upright position. Incidents like Sunday's event have been a rarity since the 2003 completion of the improvement project.

Our justice system fails young adults and their communities; so let's fix it

By Evandro Carvalho

As a prosecutor, my job was to keep communities safe and crime-free. I worked with smart, committed people, but we struggled with a system rife with inadequacies. While crime is generally down in Massachusetts and nationally, our justice system has never adequately addressed issues facing young adults in their late teens and early twenties. We all pay a heavy price for this failure. Young adults commit a disproportionate number of crimes and have the highest recidivism rate of any age group. Arrest and prosecution have not had the desired effect with this age cohort, and there is considerable evidence that these strategies have been detrimental.

Many of the stakeholders recognize that we need to take action. The juvenile justice system has lower recidivism rates than the adult system, because it is tailored work for adolescents. We know that adolescents have an enormous potential for rehabilitation. So rather than have them sit in a cell all day – the standard in adult facilities – the juvenile system makes people participate in education, counseling, and other programming that capitalizes on their potential. This system does not exclude the offenders from punishment. Rather, the punishment levied has a purpose. This is something that can rarely be said about the adult system.

People do not become different human beings the day they turn 18. Maturation is a process. A 20-year-old is neurologically more similar to a teen than an older adult. At this age, their brains are still developing and evolving. That means the potential is still strong to direct them toward a way of life that is productive and law-abiding. Unfortunately, the potential is also there to direct the person toward repeat offending. We know that young adults are keenly influenced by their environments. Adult jails and prisons are not the right places to learn about responsible behavior. They are schools for dysfunction.

Several bills, including H3037 which I have sponsored, would move the majority of people under 21 to the juvenile justice system, while reserving adult prosecution for the most serious crimes. Massachusetts would be the first state in the nation to set the upper age of juvenile jurisdiction at 20. It is a bold reform. It is also common sense. We have a juvenile justice system that objectively works much better than our adult system. We have a group of people who are not being rehabilitated by the adult system and share fundamental similarities to the youth who are already succeeding in the juvenile justice system. The real question is: What took us so long to consider this?

The benefits of raising the age extend beyond public safety. This is a reform that supports community prosperity. Where the juvenile system provides some measure of confidentiality, an adult record is an opportunity killer. It becomes harder for a young person to get an education, a job, or a place to live. They may be denied the opportunity to serve in the military or become a foster parent. Because we are more active in policing and prosecuting some communities, including those I represent, the system's counterproductive handling of young adults places an economic burden on already struggling neighborhoods.

Residents of Dorchester and Roxbury made up 47 percent of those committed to the Nashua Street Jail and Suffolk County House of Corrections in 2013. The state spent nearly $34.5 million locking up my neighbors in these places – money that the state didn't have to devote to our community's schools, civic life, or health. That tragic misdirection of resources is multiplied by what happens in those places: Young men and women are branded in a way that will make it harder for them to learn and earn, often for a lifetime.

The way that the justice system treats young people inflicts pain on many of our communities. We can change this by simply looking at and responding to the facts. The adult system makes young adults more likely to reoffend and less likely to achieve economic independence and prosperity. The juvenile system gets much higher marks in both areas. Instead of doing what we have always done, we must do what works.

Evandro Carvalho is the state representative for the Fifth Suffolk District, which includes parts of Dorchester and Roxbury.

“The interesting thing is for baseball, in general nationally, numbers are down for kids playing baseball,” Gartley said. “I don’t know exactly what the reason is.”

Gartley said that at a summit earlier this year, plenty of recreation advocates agreed that the decline in youth baseball players was “a big issue.” Many attributed it to the numerous options available for youth summer sports, from soccer to lacrosse.

Since Gartley began as executive director in 2013, enrollment in sports programs at ADSL has nearly quadrupled, she said. She believes this is largely a result of neighborhood outreach programs. Representatives have done community engagement in Dorchester’s “supermarkets and hair salons,” Gartley said, and bilingual coaches have recruited from Vietnamese and Hispanic communities in and around Fields Corner.

“Our numbers have been really good as a result of that,” Gartley said. “It’s not like, if we build it, they will come, because they don’t know we’ve built it.”

ADSL has long roots in community engagement and integration in Dorchester. Its founding in 1983 was a direct response to racial violence and growing racial tension in the neighborhood, according to the program’s website.

“ADSL has been such an integral part of the Dorchester community because it was started as a result of post-busing violence in the ‘80s,” Gartley said. “The reason it was created was to bring kids of different backgrounds together to learn how to play on the same team.”

For Gartley, who has lived in Dorchester for 30 years, the ability to continue the league’s mission of bringing her neighborhood together is paramount. ADSL’s programs play an integral role here, she said.

“Every single day, I talk to people who say, ‘I used to play for ADSL,’ or ‘My kid used to play,’”

Gartley said. “It’s got an incredible history that I want to continue in Dorchester.”

Over Gartley’s four years with ADSL, she said this year’s registration has been the largest. She credits a focus on retention through other programs like tutoring and cooking classes. She also makes sure to stay in contact with children throughout the year—so, she says, she can tell them, “Hey, we’re thinking about you. Come on back in.”

“We have a lot of kids who are really stressed out,” Gartley said. “They come from low-income, underserved families. There’s a lot of pressure at home, for whatever reason, so I think it’s really important that we can get physical activity for these kids.”

Right now, the league is still seeking additional coaches. Gartley is the only full-time employee at the nonprofit organization, but she said she works with an AmeriCorps VISTA member and several part-time program directors who receive stipends for their

“We do a lot with a little. Basically, I’ve become really good at scheduling and ordering uniforms,” Gartley said, laughing.

Her children have grown up, but her 30-year-old daughter, 24-year-old daughter, and 20-year-old son have all been involved with the league. Her son coaches there, and he and her younger daughter both tutor. Gartley believes ADSL’s mission is to provide the neighborhood with “the safest and healthiest opportunities we can.”

“As a mom of kids who have done athletics, I have a sense of what parents want for their kids, and I know they want a really good solid program that’s reasonable, and they want really good coaches,” Gartley said. “Those are the two sort of guiding principles that I use. Like, what would I want for my kids?”

The goal: ‘Save Purnell Today’

BiNCA math teacher Taylor Sabky (center) is surrounded by students and signs of support for her son, Purnell. A fundraising campaign has raised almost $400,000 for research. Taylor says students have stopped her in the hallway, emptied their pockets—sometimes only pulling up loose change—saying, “Here, this is for your son.”

for their son, but also assisting other people who have children with the disease, and alert those who may not yet be parents.

"Purnell could start declining in two months," Sam said in an interview with the Reporter. "It's urgent. There's no other word for it. If it doesn't line up for him, it's going to line up for someone else. But we want to save our son." Their mission is simple, yet onerous: raise money to help find a cure.

Days after Purnell was diagnosed, his parents connected with Steven Laffoon, whose son, Wylder, died of Niemann-Pick Type A in July of 2012. Wylder, who had turned three in May of that year, has now become eponymous with the nonprofit that Steven founded in September of 2013, the Wylder Nation Foundation, an organization whose primary objective is financing medical research for the genetic disorder. Steven, though, said the organization's main goal is to open channels of communication.

"There's a huge gap between people trying to coordinate for these rare diseases," he said. "You'd think it'd be common sense. But because the platform's so small, the right people are usually not talking to each other."

Taylor and Sam had already heard from the doctor who diagnosed Purnell about the possibility for gene therapy, but it was only when they talked with Laffoon that they realized that funding was a highly significant roadblock in the way of a cure. A lot of money was necessary, said Laffoon – anywhere from between $600,000 to $1,000,000.

A majority of the funds would go to building a clinical vector capable of delivering a healthy gene to Purnell's brain, which would act like a virus by spreading and replacing unhealthy genes with new, vital ones. Think of a delivery truck that moves produce from its source to the grocery store. The rotten apples at the store are the unhealthy genes; the fresh produce, the healthy ones. A clinical vector is the truck that delivers the produce. And only one apple is needed, because it will multiply and take out the rotten ones.

For Taylor and Sam, there is cautious optimism. A GoFundMe page was built during this past Memorial Day weekend under the title “Save Purnell Today.” Networks of friends, family, and colleagues were contacted over the phone, through email, and social media platforms, Taylor explained, with no expectations for how things might go.

Over the next 18 days and into this week, "Save Purnell Today" has raised almost $400,000. The page has been visited by people close to the family, acquaintances long fallen out of touch, friends of friends, and folks whom Taylor refers to as "perfect strangers."

Nothing, though, compares to the reception Taylor has received from the students at BiNCA. "My desk area," she said, "is full of posters and inspirational messages that the students made in art class. It's a shrine that just makes me smile when I come into school."

BiNCA is a school of remarkable diversity: its students represent 24 countries and almost 40 languages. Many of them have written letters to their friends and family in their native tongues—Spanish, Cape Verdean Creole, Haitian, and Arabic, to name a few—describing Purnell's situation and noting the money needed to make his continued living a possibility.

While many students would usually be outside enjoying the weather with their friends during this time of year, said Panion Tase, a native of Albania who teaches computer science at the school, the students are staying around school and working for Purnell's cause. "It's a collective thing," he said. "I have been so impressed with the amount of interest we have from students."

Student government leaders have coordinated a talent show for today (Thurs., June 15) to continue raising both awareness and money. They see Taylor in the hallway, stop to empty their pockets—sometimes only pulling up loose change—while saying, “Here, this is for your son.”

During the course of the phone interview with Taylor and Sam, Purnell was making plenty of noise as he woke up from his afternoon nap. "He likes to sing when he wakes up," Sam says, laughing.

Purnell's favorite band? The Eagles. Whenever Taylor or right off. Now, when he wakes up, Purnell can be heard attempting to hum the band's songs.

"He started cooing like that around six months," Taylor said, laughing herself. "But, only within the last two months has he really found his pitch."

Franklin Park, redesign of Columbia Road discussed at meeting

By MELISSA McNICKLES
REPORTER CORRESPONDENT

Enhancements to Franklin Park, the redesign of Columbia Road as an active green corridor and the completion of the Emerald Necklace are part of the Imagine Boston 2030 final draft plan for Boston's largest park. Last Thursday (June 8), members of the Imagine Boston 2030 committee and other city agencies met with community members at the Franklin Park golf clubhouse to gather residents' feedback on the final draft of the plan.

Imagine Boston 2030 is an initiative of Mayor Walsh that invites residents to assist in creating a vision for the city's growth focusing on building healthier and more inclusive communities. The initiative specifically calls for investment in infrastructure and open space and culture. It will be Boston's first citywide plan in 50 years.

Many residents mentioned the importance of Franklin Park, the 485-acre "crown jewel" of Frederick Law Olmsted's Emerald Necklace, when sharing their visions during the planning process. An initial meeting was held in February, where community members voiced their specific ideas for enhancing the park.

"This park is a jewel," said State Rep. Russell Holmes at the June 8 meeting, adding that the Imagine Boston 2030 plan will help Boston become "the world-class city that we're hoping to be."

The draft for Franklin Park calls for investment in additional arts and cultural activities within the park, improved access and transportation connections, increased safety measures and traffic calming, enhanced navigational aids and continuing to foster the park's role as an inclusive gathering place.

Boston Parks Commissioner Chris Cook believes the Imagine Boston 2030 vision is an "opportunity" to make Franklin Park one of Boston's greatest destinations.

"When people come to Boston, they talk about the boats, the esplanade... they will also say, 'Did you see Franklin Park?'" he said when welcoming community members to the meeting.

The plan also aspires to redesign Columbia Road and integrate it as a connector between Franklin Park and Joe Moakley Park in South Boston, connecting the Emerald Necklace with the waterfront. Concerns about the road's current design include limited parking, speeding and safety for cyclists.

The proposed vision calls for "improved pedestrian paths and safe crossings, protected bike paths, and significantly more trees to transform this boulevard into a vibrant green corridor."

In the Imagine Boston 2030 draft plan, local businesses expressed that the traffic keeps customers away. The plan highlights the economic potential for small businesses near Franklin Park to connect and engage with park visitors.

John Linehan, president and CEO of Zoo New England, which includes the Franklin Park Zoo, agrees. He was among those in attendance Thursday evening.

"It's incredibly exciting," said Linehan, who has overseen operations at Franklin Park Zoo for 35 years. He mentioned that attracting outside visitors has always been a challenge, as many hold negative views of the neighborhoods surrounding Franklin Park.

He wants to see zoo visitors engage more with those areas. He believes the Imagine Boston 2030 vision provides the opportunity for the zoo to "accelerate" some "real, tangible progress."

"It can help the zoo to help others," Linehan said, acknowledging the relevance of the zoo's location within Franklin Park. "A world-class city needs a world-class park."

Local resident and park user Andréa Speace was happy to see many individuals from both the community and the city at the meeting, and happy about the way planning has occurred so far. "I'm glad to see the process more inclusive," she said.

The next step is to finish reviewing feedback of the entire 420-page draft plan, said Natalia Urtubey, Director of Engagement for Imagine Boston 2030. June 19 will be the last day to collect feedback.

New opioid threat on South Shore: Carfentanil

Law enforcement officials in a town about 25 miles south of Boston are warning residents to beware after authorities last week said three drug samples had tested positive for a drug that is about 100 times more powerful than the deadly synthetic opioid fentanyl.

“We are extremely concerned about the introduction of carfentanil in Massachusetts, which dramatically increases the chances that someone will die from a drug overdose,” Whitman Fire Chief Timothy Grenno said in a statement released Sunday. “This is a substance so dangerous, that we’ve seen cases where first responders overdose from simply touching it.”

According to Grenno and Whitman Police Chief Scott Benton, two of the drug samples that tested positive for carfentanil, a drug used to tranquilize large animals, were seized by Brockton Police and another was seized by transit police in the Quincy area. The samples were tested in the State Police Crime Lab.

Citing information from the Drug Enforcement Administration, Whitman officials said illicit fentanyl and other synthetic opioids can resemble powdered drugs such as heroin or cocaine and can be in pill or capsule form, “often represented as OxyContin, Xanax or other diverted pharmaceutical drugs.”

“This is the first time we’re seeing this lethal substance in Massachusetts, which signifies that this epidemic has taken a turn for the worse,” Benton said. “Our number one priority is public safety and preventing the senseless loss of life due to overdose, and we will continue to strictly enforce drug laws in an effort to keep these deadly substances off our streets.”

Looking back, looking ahead as the winter games finally end

On the eve of summer, winter finally ends. The skates are hung up, sneakers stashed away. Seasons that once routinely ended around Easter now drag on to the ides of June. But all good things come to an end. The winter games, having long overstayed their leave, are finally packing it in. Bring on the off-season.

For hockey, the show was spectacular with the passions of the struggle for the Stanley Cup seemingly rising in intensity game after game, round after round. Admiration – much of it from people who neither know nor care about this game – came from all corners. Can athletes give more of themselves for a cause, let alone an old silver Cup?

There were many moments in these playoffs when you had to wonder, and marvel. The conclusion, full of fury and desperation, was monumental. A fluke goal that handcuffed the Nashville Predators' gallant goalie Pekka Rinne decided it. All that magnificent effort and a mere quirk is the margin of difference. It may seem unfair, but it was actually appropriate because that's the way it was throughout these playoffs.

It seemed near-every competitor, including the Bruins, came within a lucky hop of the puck of moving on, lacking only a deferential nod from the Hockey Gods. Which takes nothing away from the Pittsburgh Penguins. They survived; the ultimate tribute.

As for the NBA's competing frolic, it was overall a relative dud, with the Warriors salivating over the prospect of putting the Cavaliers out of their misery early on, which they did come Monday night, ending things at 4-1. It was so gracious of Golden State to spare Cleveland the humiliation of getting brutally swept, the sensitivities of that beleaguered town being ever an issue in sports, it seems.

We can be further thankful that Golden State got denied the unprecedented honor of sweeping the entire bloody playoffs. Had they won 16 straight, we'd never have heard the end of it. The conventional caveats about not assuming anything can be dispensed with here, although there's always the chance the Warriors could get engulfed by their own swelling ego, maybe their only meaningful flaw. It's a good team for the moment, but having won a couple of times they've been loudly comparing themselves with the Auerbach-

Russell-Cousy-era Celtics. Please advise them that after they win about ten more they can check back with us.

Otherwise, these basketball playoffs were ugly. Apologists insist it doesn't matter, but how can a league remain truly interesting when there's so little competitive balance? It's bad enough having about half the teams eliminated from playoff contention by Thanksgiving and a half dozen finishing with winning percentages that would be historically low in any other league; but to have the two-month post-season festival – your signature event – totally dominated by embarrassingly one-sided romps is quite another. The NBA is devoid of suspense. What compels one to watch? Have there been more than a half dozen play-off games you could faintly term "interesting," let alone "dramatic?" Haven't been keeping score, I must confess. The NBA has a huge problem, even if it doesn't intend to admit it.

Meanwhile, an off-season is about to arrive that that offers great promise as Danny Ainge's master plan for the restoration of Celtics hegemony reaches critical mass. What will they do with that precious No. 1 pick, heisted from pathetic Brooklyn? Do they actually believe Lonzo Ball, son of the dreaded LaVall, is not the clear first pick? Or is it just that they'll do anything to avoid having to deal with the eccentric super-dad. Fascinating!

Wouldn't it be grand if Red Auerbach were still around to reveal how the Maestro Himself would deal with such an odd conundrum? Red going one on one with LaVal would have been a match-up for the ages. But no matter whom they draft, more needs to be done to complete the task. What else? That is the question.

Significantly more than the Celtics, the Bruins have an off-season with a potentially make or break impact. This is the crossroads for the new, still unproven Sweeney-Neely & Company ruling consortium. Another bad free agent blunder (like Matt Beleskey) or ill-advised trade (like for Jimmy Hayes) or miscalculated contract tendering (like that of David Backes) will negate too much of the good GM Sweeney has done re-building the farm system, so far in his third year of stewardship his proudest claim.

And while that's hardly insignificant it's not enough. Other moves integrating wise elders with the eager kids will be crucial if they're to remain competitive – more than ever demanded nowadays – while a new generation of home-grown talent comes of age. BU drop-out Charlie McAvoy, whose playoff debut on defense was so impressive, looks a safe bet. So does Brandon Carlo. And they have high hopes for Anders Bjork, the smallish but reportedly swift sniper they've convinced to forego his education at Notre Dame.

You hear equally nice things about a dozen others. But who knows? Where prospects are concerned, I'm from Missouri. Meanwhile, how much do Zdeno Chara, Patrice Bergeron, David Krejci, Mr. Backes, even Tuukka Rask, have left? For Sweeney, the urgent process begins momentarily with the expansion-draft stocking of the Las Vegas Knights, the latest hockey team planted in the desert by Czar Gary Bettman.

The Bruins have to lose somebody, and at a minimum it's likely to be a defenseman; either the estimable grinder Adam McQuaid or one of the Miller boys, Colin or Kevan. It's unavoidable but manageable. Then what?

Stay tuned!

BOYS & GIRLS CLUBS OF DORCHESTER

Boys & Girls Clubs of Dorchester Summer Program Fun For Everyone

Boys & Girls Clubs of Dorchester has so much fun planned for the summer! The Club closes for the after-school drop-in membership program and activities this week on Friday, June 16th, but there are still tons of things to do with BGCD this summer.

The main program is the Boys & Girls Clubs of Dorchester Summer Fun program which allows neighborhood kids to continue attending the Club once school lets out for the summer. The program runs from 8:30AM- 5:30PM, Monday through Friday, providing a safe space for youth to learn and grow while parents are at work.

Each day of the Summer Fun program is structured similarly to an after-school rotation at the Club, with each age group spending certain times in each activity area and then moving on to the next one. With this rotation, each child has a chance to experience art, music, physical activity, educational activities, and more every day.

The teen program is a little bit different, and is called Safe Summer Streets. Teens are welcome from 3-11PM Monday through Friday on a drop-in basis.

Breakfast and lunch are included in the summer program for members aged 5-12. A snack and dinner are provided for teen members who attend the Safe Summer Streets program because it takes place later in the day to align with the needs of teens and the activities targeted toward them.

Special trips are also a big part of summer at Boys & Girls Clubs of Dorchester. Many day trips are offered throughout the summer, including to the Boston Harbor Islands and area museums and beaches, plus more. A separate trip to Disney World with all expenses paid (sponsored by Rodman Disney for Kids), is one of the most anticipated events of the year. 150 youth and chaperones from the Club and partner agencies get the chance to fly to Florida and spend six days at the Disney World theme park. Kids are chosen by staff members to attend the trip, and it's a one-time honor so that as many kids as possible get to experience it.

Another highlight of the summer at Boys & Girls Clubs of Dorchester is the week at Camp Northbound. Kids are nominated to attend Camp, and once they have attended they are invited back for every subsequent year until they graduate high school. This is a typical week-long sleepaway camp, located in Maine, but only fellow members and staff of Boys & Girls Clubs of Dorchester are there that week. It is a fantastic opportunity to experience sleepaway camp and all the activities that come along with it. For some members, this is their first time spending so much time outside of the city or the first time swimming in a lake.

These experiences are all part of Boys & Girls Clubs of Dorchester's mission to inspire and enable all young people, from diverse circumstances, to realize their full potential by providing opportunities for personal growth. If you have any questions about the summer programs do not hesitate to call our membership coordinator at 617-288-7120. Please note that the Summer Fun program for 5-12 year olds is currently full.

A Note About Our Meals: Because the food that we provide is part of the Summer Food Service Program through the Massachusetts Department of Elementary and Secondary Education, we are required to state: Boys & Girls Clubs of Dorchester is participating in the Summer Food Service Program.

Meals will be provided to all enrolled children without charge and are the same for all children regardless of race, color, national origin, sex, age or disability, and there will be no discrimination in the course of the meal service.
